RECITATIONS AT THE PIANO.

"... Mr. Levey possesses the poetic temperament in a marked degree, and is moreover blessed with an excellent sense of humour. ... Mr. Levey has an undoubted gift of dramatic expression, and that he is also a musician is proved by the appropriate and often striking themes with which he accompanies his recitations. He should be doubly welcome just now, when the gap left by the late Mr. Clifford Harrison, the reciter par excellence, is still waiting to be filled."—Public Opinion, February 19, 1904.

THE

PARISH CHOIR MANUAL

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES AT MORNING AND EVENING PRAYER

SET TO APPROPRIATE CHANTS

FERIAL AND FESTAL RESPONSES, LITANY,
RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS, FINAL AMENS,
VESPER HYMNS AND VESTRY PRAYERS

TOGETHER WITH

ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENTS TO THE LORD'S PRAYER,
APOSTLES' AND NICENE CREEDS.

The Canticles, with the Cathedral Psalter Pointing, have been set to appropriate Chants by Sir John Stainer, Sir George C. Martin, Sir Joseph Barnby, Sir George Elvey, and other well-known church composers.

The Responses to the Commandments have been selected from the Services of the above composers as well as those of Myles B. Foster, Dr. Garrett, Ch. Gounod, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Merbecke, H. Smart, John E. West, S. S. Wesley, and others.

Sir John Stainer's Sevenfold Amen is also included, as well as Vesper Hymns by Beethoven, Sullivan, and others; concluding with two Vestry Prayers by S. S. Wesley and the Rev. Canon Hervey.

PREFACE.

Organists, choirmasters and librarians of choirs often have occasion to wish for a choral service-book of a comprehensive nature. This desideratum the "Parish Choir Manual" seeks to meet by supplying within one cover the Canticles for Morning and Evening Prayer, Responses (Ferial, Festal, and to the Commandments), Final Amens, Vesper Hymns, and Vestry Prayers, in addition to organ accompaniments to the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

The constant usefulness and the practicability of such a compilation are obvious, and a glance at the names of the composers will assure confidence in a publication that should commend itself for use "in quires and places where they sing."

Separately, from the above:

THE RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS. Price 6d.
THE CANTICLES. Price 4d.

JUNE 1, 1904.

MUSICAL TIMES COMPETITIONS.

We have now the pleasure of making known the awards for the two prizes, of fifteen guineas each, offered by the Proprietors of THE MUSICAL TIMES for the composition of an anthem and a part-song, according to conditions set forth in our January issue. Of the 301 compositions sent in, the anthems numbered 144, the part-songs 157.

The Anthem prize is awarded for a setting of 'Thy word is a lantern unto my feet' (from Psalm 119) by 'Lux,' which proves to be the composition of

Mr. G. COLEMAN YOUNG, 57, Lambton Road,
Wimbledon.

Some of the anthem competitors lost their chance by not complying with the conditions in regard to the length of the compositions they sent in.

The successful Part-song prize is a setting of some seventeenth-century words, 'A Shepherd in a glade,' a composition which bears the motto 'Si je puis,' that adopted by

Mr. CYRIL B. ROTHAM,
Organist of St. John's College, Cambridge, to whom the prize is awarded. Mr. Rotherham's prize part-song appears in the present issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

An extra prize is awarded for a part-song entitled 'A field flower' (words by James Montgomery), bearing the motto 'Nitor in adversum,' the composition of

Dr. DAVAN WETTON,
8, Marlborough Place,
N.W.

The unsuccessful competitors can have their manuscripts returned to them upon application to the Editor.

THEN AND NOW.

A DIAMOND JUBILEE RETROSPECT.

THE MUSICAL TIMES came into existence on the first day of June in the year 1844; thus to-day it completes sixty years of life—a period longer than that attained by any other English journal devoted to music. These simple facts speak for themselves, and sufficiently celebrate this Diamond Jubilee occasion.

But let us hark back to the year 1844 and take a few peeps at the musical life of sixty years ago. When THE MUSICAL TIMES, as a modest sheet of eight pages including the music, first saw the light, three other musical periodicals appeared at weekly intervals—the Musical World, the Dramatic and Musical Review, and the Musical Examiner. All three, having had their day, are now defunct. The Musical World—which lasted from 1836 to 1891, a period of fifty-five years—held the foremost place in English musical journalism, and the hand of Mr. Davison, not then musical critic of The Times, can be traced in its pages. At that time (we are speaking of the month of June, 1844) 'J. W. D.' was very much on the war-path, his bête noire being the musical critic of the Morning Post, a gentleman whom he nicknamed 'Jenkins.' 'The acknowledged musical critic of the Morning Post,' wrote Mr. Davison, 'would scarcely know an arpeggio from a jew's harp, or a duet from a fiddle.' Again: 'His praise is worthless, because it has no foundation and is merely the offspring of unaccountable caprice, or personal obligation, or the grateful remembrance of an excellent dinner, or the savoury anticipation of a capital supper, or something of the kind.' As he (Davison) had two musical papers—the Musical World and the Musical Examiner—at his command, he was able to pour forth double-barrelled Jenkinsiana week by week with that trenchant forcefulness of style which so eminently characterized his pen. The law of libel, even if less stringent then than now, seems to have had no terrors for the redoubtable 'J. W. D.'

The London musical season of 1844 was exceedingly brilliant. The foreign visitors included Mendelssohn, Thalberg, Ernst, Sivori, Staudigl, Offenbach (then a violoncellist), Grisi, Lablache, Mario, Piatti, and Joachim—veritably a galaxy of talent! Mendelssohn conducted five concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, at one of which Joseph Joachim, then a boy barely thirteen years of age, played Beethoven's Violin Concerto with magical effect. At this concert (May 27, 1844) the 'Wedding March' was played for the first time in this country and was encored; 'but,' recorded a critic, 'before its repetition Mendelssohn left his desk for a moment to stop the drum.' Mendelssohn also played and conducted at several other concerts during his stay in London. An advertisement of one, announced to be given on June 1 by Moscheles and Ernst, contained this information: 'Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy will give a grand performance on the Organ'; but a subsequent advertisement stated: 'The organ in the Hanover Square Rooms being found by Dr. Mendelssohn not to have German Pedals, he is prevented giving the Organ Performance, as previously announced.'

Coming to the present time one cannot help being struck with the immense development which has taken place in church music. Sixty years ago there were only four surpliced choirs in London—St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, and the Temple Church. The west-end gallery position prevailed for the organ, the instrument being surrounded by a handful of charity children who led the singing of the sanctuary in a manner uncharitable to the art of music. Such a thing as an anthem, much less a solo, in a Nonconformist church would have been regarded with as much horror as rank infidelity. But all that has been changed, and changed very much for the better in the promotion of a more orderly and reverent rendering of divine service in the churches of all denominations.

If vocal attainment in the present day does not exceed that in concert-room and opera of bygone days—e.g. Clara Novello, Sainton Dolby, Sims Reeves, Mario and Staudigl—technical skill in instrumental interpretativeness has made extraordinary strides. Sixty years ago there were no lady violinists. Now their name is legion. The spread of choral music up and down the country during the last half-century is a great factor in the musical uplift of the nation; and the educational value of the rapidly growing competition movement is also a sign of the times.

The evolution of orchestration has made enormous demands upon all orchestral players, who however have splendidly overcome the difficulties of modern compositions; in this respect we may challenge the world. In regard to pianoforte-playing, there are many pianists who display their technical skill on mighty-toned instruments to such an extent that one often sighs for more music and less agility. And what shall be said of the modern organ? Sixty years ago equal temperament was unknown in this connection, and the C pedal-board was only just coming into vogue in England; tubular-pneumatic and electric actions were not invented. But now! Organs of four and five manuals, over-voiced stops, high-pressure reeds, and extraordinary mechanical contrivances.

With the mere mention that sixty years ago there was only one Music School (the Royal Academy of Music), and, except at the Universities, no examinations in music, we may, in conclusion, refer to the reputation which British composers have made for themselves in recent years, not only at home, but abroad. There is no need to mention the names of those who by the fruits of their genius have removed the stigma which foreigners, often unjustly, have placed upon English creative music. The past is rich in achievement, the future is bright with promise. Therefore we may take courage and do all we can to create and foster a love for music in this our favoured land, and in so doing further the cause of an art that is divine.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD ALVERSTONE, G.C.M.G.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND, AND PRESIDENT OF THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

It is as impossible to estimate the influence of the amateur in music as it is to measure the influence of music upon the amateur. Each bears a co-relationship to the other—not only, be it observed, of mutual receptivity, but capable of enormous possibilities. And this without provoking a spirit of antagonism to the professional; indeed, without the amateur the professional would be in the predicament of Othello, in finding his occupation gone. Moreover, is not the love and practice of music—a commonwealth of untold pleasure—possible to the whole community? The Welsh miner, the poor factory girl of Lancashire, the metal-worker of Sheffield, the shop assistant in many a town—is not the monotony of their lives brightened, and do they not breathe a diviner air as they uplift their voices in choral song? Nor must we forget the numberless singers in church and chapel who voluntarily consecrate their gifts in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs; nor those who brighten home-life by the exercise of their vocal and instrumental powers. Again, the sphere of the amateur's influence in propagating a love of music is by no means narrowed by the force of circumstances. We may point, for example, to the man of wealth, as illustrated by so munificent a music-lover as Mr. Carnegie; to the philanthropic enthusiast, of which Miss Wakefield is a splendid example; to the man of letters, genial George Grove, of pleasant memory; and to many an overworked and underpaid schoolmistress who, in the brightest of school hours—that devoted to music—causes the hearts of the little ones to sing for joy. And we may not look in vain to find those in high places who, as cultured and earnest-minded amateurs, have shown or continue to show a very warm and practical interest in the art of music. In this important connection two names are readily called to mind: the late Prince Consort, and the Lord Chief Justice of England, who forms the subject of this Biographical Sketch.

Lord Alverstone (Richard Everard Webster), son of the late Mr. Thomas Webster, Q.C., was born on December 22, 1842, at 4, Chester Place, Chester Square, London. At a very early age he showed a great love for music. 'In this I was much encouraged by my step-mother, who was herself a beautiful singer and who taught me the solos from the oratorios, "I know that my Redeemer liveth" and other soprano songs,' Lord Alverstone says, as, in his pleasant house at Kensington, he recalls his youthful music-makings.

From 1851 to 1857 he was a pupil at King's College School. 'There was absolutely no music there,' he says, 'and when I reached the age of thirteen or fourteen, according to the ideas prevalent at that time I was not allowed to continue learning to play the piano, to my lasting regret, as at that age two or three years' steady work at the instrument would have made all the difference to me in afterlife.' In 1857, aged fifteen, he went to Charterhouse School, then in the heart of the City, where music has always been given a prominent place in the curriculum. In illustration thereof we may reprint—from the article on Charterhouse which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of December last—the order of the Governors of Charterhouse, dated July 6, 1626:—

We doe desire the said Comittées or any fower of them to take into their considerācon what the chardge will be of havinge an Organ within the Chappell of the said Hospitall and to sett downe what stipend &c shall be allowed yerely to mainteyne an Organist that shall playe uppon the said Organs, and teach the Schollers of the said house to sing prick songe and to play uppon any instrument for we doe well allowe to have an Organ and an Organist within the hospitall soe that the chardge be not excessive.

When Richard Webster went to Charterhouse School John Hullah was organist and music-master. 'Hullah, then in full vigour, was a man of wonderful power,' recalls the Lord Chief Justice. 'He taught the boys—there were then only about 130 in the school, of whom from 30 to 40 were in the singing class—sight-singing on what is called the Hullah system, though sol, re, mi is a great deal older than Hullah, and we had regular instruction. I sang bass in the chapel choir, in which there was an old G organ, and took part in the school concerts—a regular institution—given under Hullah's direction. The programmes, made up of sacred and secular pieces, always included a glee by either Stevens or Horsley, both organists of Charterhouse, and on more than one occasion we sang the "Macbeth" music.' In reply to an inquiry as to whether Lord Alverstone appeared as a soloist at these school concerts, he replies: 'Yes, my first solo was Himmel's "Inclina ad me," better known as "Incline Thine ear".'

In 1861 Lord Alverstone went up to Cambridge with a scholarship and entered Trinity College. He was very fortunate in being introduced to the late Gerard Cobb, who always extended a warm welcome to any musically-disposed undergraduate, and whose Sunday evening musical gatherings were for more than a generation a great feature at Cambridge. He remembers that one of the first compositions by Mr. Cobb was a setting of 'Onaway, awake, beloved.' For three years he was a member of the voluntary choir of his College chapel, and the singing of quartets in Mr. Sedley Taylor's rooms is also recalled. As an active member of the Cambridge University Musical Society he took part in a grand concert at which some Wagner was performed forty years ago, probably the first time that any strains by that master were heard in Cambridge. 'The tenors lost their lead—the music was so new,' he laughingly says, 'and the chorus never sang the closing movement at all, but the band went on, and at the end the audience applauded vigorously.' He was an original member of the Clare Musical Society, and in various ways threw himself into the musical life of the University. Athletics, too, had a strong fascination for him. He is joint author, with Mr. C. W. Alcock, of 'Surrey cricket,' and he contributed the Introduction to the 'Athletics' volume of the Badminton Library series. His studies were however by no means neglected; he came out 35th Wrangler and took a 3rd class in Classics. In 1892 his Alma mater conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D.

On leaving Cambridge Lord Alverstone followed his father's profession of the law. It is not necessary here to give a detailed account of his brilliant career at the Bar, to which he was called in 1868, and where he rapidly achieved a great reputation for his conduct of engineering, patent, shipping, and railway cases. He 'took silk' at the unusually early age of thirty-five; he became Attorney-General in 1885, Master of the Rolls in May, 1900, and in September of the same year, Lord Chief Justice of England, an office he worthily holds. He was a Member of Parliament from 1885 to 1900, and he rendered splendid service to his country in connection with the Behring Sea and Venezuelan Arbitrations. He is a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1893 he was created G.C.M.G., in 1899 a Baronet, and the following year raised to the Peerage with the title of Baron Alverstone. For a short time Lord Alverstone was chairman of the Historical Documents Commission; he is still a member of that useful body.

To return to the musical side of his Lordship's career. On settling down to the work of his profession in London he by no means gave up an art which has given him so much pleasure throughout his busy and useful life. In 1867 he joined the Abbey Glee Club, of which he is now the President and its senior member by some ten or twelve years. Five years later he became a voluntary member of the choir of St. Mary Abbots Church (the Parish Church), Kensington, and he has sung at the services there ever since. As there are four services every Sunday, Lord Alverstone sings at those held at the hours of 9.30 (morning), and 4 (evening), one of his fellow choirmen being Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland. In this connection we are indebted to Mr. Henry R. Bird, the organist of St. Mary Abbots Church, for the following appreciation of his Lordship:—

'In acceding to the Editor's request that I should contribute a few notes regarding the help that Lord Alverstone has rendered to the choir at Kensington, I must indulge in a short retrospect.

'When I was appointed organist of the new Parish Church of Kensington, which was to be consecrated in 1872, I found that a choir of ladies and gentlemen had been selected. During the remainder of the life of the late Archdeacon Sinclair this choir sang at the two principal services, at 11.30 and 7; a choir of girls from a Parochial Training School singing at 9.30 and 4 o'clock. The Rev. W. D. Maclagan (now Archbishop of York) succeeded to the living in 1875, and one of his first changes was to introduce a surpliced choir of boys and men at the 11.30 and 7 o'clock services. About this time Mr. Richard Webster, as Lord Alverstone was then, joined the choir, and used his great influence in every way. The choir was entirely voluntary, and, as a very effectual way of keeping a hold over the boys, he commenced the practice of having them at his house for an occasional treat, a custom he has continued ever since. In the course of time it was found impossible to keep up the supply of voluntary boys, and then Sir Richard Webster provided the money to give them prizes instead of a salary. Later on, when all the boys were paid, he agreed that this sum should be made the nucleus of a bonus fund, which was started by our then choirmaster, Mr. Higham, and which has worked very well in retaining boys. The men also were drawn from all classes, and it was a great boon for me to have such a helper to support me on all occasions.

'When Mr. Glyn became vicar, he, after a time, wished to have a surplised choir also at the other two services, and again Sir Richard Webster readily threw the weight of his influence and his invaluable guidance into the arrangements. It was then decided that the choir who sang at 9.30 and 4 should be voluntary, such members as Sir Richard (then Mr.) Webster, Mr. A. D. Coleridge, and Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland consenting to take part in what is now called the second choir, and that paid help should be engaged for the other services. We have at present nearly sixty boys belonging to the two choirs.

'Not only has Lord Alverstone sung his part so regularly and efficiently in the choral music at the church, but he generously spares neither trouble nor expense in helping on whatever is necessary for the musical services. I have been a frequent visitor to his house, and should like to record his intimate knowledge and thorough appreciation of the classics of vocal music.'

Lord Alverstone took an active part in the concerts, conducted by the Hon. Seymour Egerton, given by Mrs. (afterwards Lady) Freake at Cromwell Houses from 1868 to 1871. As an acceptable bass soloist he sang at a great many concerts all over London—to aid various institutions—in connection with the People's Concert Society, and he has not unfrequently undertaken to get up concerts which have proved successful in connection with Trinity Mission, Cambridge House, and other similar organizations. He has been a member of the Madrigal Society since 1898, and, in succession to the late Sir Arthur Sullivan, has been the President of this ancient organization for the past three years. No more fitting conclusion could be made to this sketch of a devoted lover of music than his own words bearing on the art:—

'It is in my opinion difficult if not impossible to over-estimate the advantages to the ordinary working woman and man of the study of music. I do not refer to cases in which natural talent may be sufficient to lead individuals to adopt a musical career as a profession, but to the influence of music on the life of a person capable of acquiring a certain amount of proficiency in musical attainments.

'To speak only for one moment on the question of health, I am convinced that, in the case of clerks and employés occupied all day in sedentary pursuits, the mere fact of using the voice-organs and lungs for twenty minutes to half-an-hour in the evening is of great value to the health. I can speak to its good effects from many years' personal experience of the benefits derived from this exercise of the voice and lungs. But apart from the question of health, the elevating and invigorating influence upon the mind of vocal music is very remarkable, tending to remove depression and direct the mind to cheering ideas.

'In my opinion the best form of the cultivation of vocal music is part- or choral-singing; the results produced by the harmonies of trained human voices not only exceed in beauty any other form of musical combination, but illustrate directly and indirectly very valuable principles.

'No one can take part in part- or choral-singing without learning the value and the grace of unselfishness. In such music no one performer or group of performers can sing for himself or themselves if he or they has or have a high standard of performance in view, and so indirectly singers are taught that consideration for others and mutual help and reliance are of great practical value. I say nothing of the personal enjoyment of part-singing and the advantage of friendships formed by intellectual and refining association with men and women of like tastes and pursuits; but there is no recreative occupation for leisure moments that I consider of greater advantage to the individual or the community than the cultivation and practice of choral singing.'

Finally, the life-work of the Lord Chief Justice—whether judged from its legal, parliamentary, public-spirited, or musical point of view—reflects in the highest degree his Lordship's motto, Veritas puritas.

WINCHESTER COLLEGE.

SEINTE MARIE COLLEGE OF WYNCHESTRE.

Winchester is the birthplace of the English public school: its originator, the celebrated William of Wykeham. This very remarkable man—Bishop of Winchester from 1367 to 1404—was an apostle of education. To him we also owe New College, Oxford.* No sooner had Wykeham completed his Oxford benefaction than he set about instituting the first public school in this country. In all probability this munificent prelate conceived his Winchester foundation more or less as a nursery for his College at Oxford, as the two institutions have always maintained a very close connection. There had long been a grammar school at Winchester, at which it is said King Ethelwulf and King Alfred were educated; but Wykeham, with an enlightened outlook rare in mediæval times, founded his College at Winchester under the governance of a powerful corporation. In so doing he not only inaugurated a new system, but gave a fresh impetus to education in this country for which his name should ever be held in honoured remembrance.

* An illustrated article on New College, Oxford, appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November, 1903, p. 707.

With a shrewdness characteristic of modern times, Wykeham, for the erection of his College, selected a site of about five acres without the city wall of Winchester in order to avoid the octroi duties then levied on everything that passed through the city gates. The opening ceremony took place on Saturday, March 28, 1393, at 9 A.M. The original buildings—of excellent proportions and solid construction—stand to this day in much the same state as when their generous founder built them five hundred years ago. They cost £1,014, a sum equal to about £20,000 of current value. The inner and larger of the two quadrangles contains Chapel and Hall. The subtle humour of mediæval workmen is exemplified by various 'conceits' which are to be seen carved in stone in this quadrangle.

THE ARMS OF WINCHESTER COLLEGE.

Over the entrance to the Hall are the Psalter and bagpipe; over the Kitchen window, Excess, a head vomiting; the Bursar's quarters are indicated by a representation of Frugality; while over the Masters' windows are the Pedagogue, the Listless Scholar, and so on.

The Hall, 63 feet long by 30 feet wide, has a finely groined oak roof. At the upper end is the dais of this noble room, and at the opposite end are the 'Hatches' from which provisions are served. To this day the scholars use as plates for their bread and cheese the square, wooden trenchers made of beech-wood. The Hall and Kitchen, with very lofty roofs, originally had open and chimneyless fireplaces, the smoke from both these apartments emitting itself from apertures made in the ceiling. On the visitation of the Bishop in 1410 a pair of porpoises were cooked in this Kitchen, which is still in use. It should be mentioned that the Hall contains some interesting oil portraits, among them being one of James Kent, a former organist, which we are enabled to reproduce for the first time (see p. 366). This fine portrait—signed 'G. M., 1743'—bears the following inscription on the frame:—

JACOBUS KENT,
Hujusce Collegii, ab anno 1737 per annos 36 deinde sequentes, Organista; vir mitis, benevolus, probus, pius.

Kent, it may be observed, was born and died at Winchester.

Another oil-painting—a quaint specimen of sixteenth-century art, and one of the most curious things in the College—is that of 'The Trusty Servant,' a canvas which hangs in a lobby just outside the Kitchen. We give a photographic reproduction of this picture in its original form: in 1778, however, it underwent a change when George the Third visited the College, on which occasion, and in honour of His Majesty, the figure received its present Brunswick uniform in place of a buff-coloured jerkin! Its attendant lines—attributed to Johnson, Headmaster from 1560 to 1571—are as follows:—

THE TRUSTY SERVANT.

A trusty servant's portrait would you see,
This emblematic figure well survey;
The porker's snout—not nice in diet shows;
The padlock shut—no secrets he'll disclose;
Patient the ass—his master's wrath to hear;
Swiftmess in errand—the stag's feet declare;
Loaded his left hand—apt to labour saith;
The vest—his neatness; open hand—his faith;
Girt with his sword, his shield upon his arm—
Himself and master he'll protect from harm.

The Chapel, built entirely of stone and containing a large east window, naturally attracts special attention. It is rather sad to think of the terrible things that were done at the restoration of this building about thirty years ago, especially the loss of the rich oak carving, the replacement of the Renaissance organ-case by one of feeble design, and other changes; but better counsels now prevail, and in due time the Chapel may become less 'restored' in appearance. The organ—at present located on the north side of the sanctuary, near the altar (as shown in the illustration on page 368)—would be better in every way if it were placed on a screen at the west end. Perhaps some his time-honoured and well-beloved Morning and Evening hymns, sacred lyrics worthily associated with his name? * Within the Cloisters, standing on the greensward in the centre thereof, is the beautiful Chantry, built about 1420, after Wykeham's death. This building, quite unique in regard to its location, was converted into a library by Warden Pincke in 1628; but now it has reverted to its original use as a chapel for the junior boys.

The old schoolroom, now called Seventh chamber, is under the Hall. 'School' (it is a custom at Winchester to dispense with the definite article) was built by Warden Nicholas in 1683. Over the entrance is a bronze statue of Wykeham, and on the western wall the Wykehamical emblems are painted. These are: A mitre and staff, beneath them aut disce; still lower, a sword, a pen, and an inkhorn, beneath them aut discede; lower still a four-pronged birch with the words manet sors tertia, caedi. And these emblems mean: The mitre and staff, the highest reward of diligence; to others the professions of the law and army are open; while to mere dunces a flogging awaits! Turning from the ancient to the modern, we may refer briefly to some recent building developments necessitated by the growth of the School and the policy of the broadening-out—modernizing in the best sense—of Wykeham's splendid foundation. These new appurtenances include the Science School (1904), and the noble Museum built in 1897, at a cost of £12,000, to commemorate the Quingentenary of the founding of the College. And then there is the handsome and effective new gateway—erected from the design of Mr. Frank Pearson—in Kingsgate Street, as a memorial to those Wykehamists who fell in the South African War. Of this In memoriam we give a photograph in the opposite column.

Another important adjunct to the educational advantages of Winchester is the fine detached building which is to serve as the Music School. It is interesting to go over this newly-completed building—one that is worthy of Winchester and the art which it is to enshrine—in company with Dr. Sweeting, the 'Master of Music,' as he is called, of the College. The large and lofty concert-hall, which constitutes its main feature, is surrounded by a number of class-rooms and practising-rooms—all sound-proof—in which the daily work of the music curriculum can be carried on. No pains or expense have been spared to make this building perfect, and it bears splendid testimony to the far-seeing and enlightened educational policy of the governing body in having erected this imposing Music School. The architect is Mr. E. S. Prior, who has carefully studied the requirements laid before him by Dr. Sweeting. In connection with this new Music School it is interesting to learn from the lips of the Headmaster of Winchester (the Rev. Dr. Burge) that he is entirely in sympathy with the development of the study of music as a recognised part of Public School education.

old Wykehamist may feel disposed to carry out so desirable a change, which, by-the-way, would relieve the exceeding bareness of the west wall. The Cloisters each side, 132 feet long, breathe an air of tranquillity fully in harmony with their old-world attractiveness. One of the names cut on the walls is that of 'Thos. Ken, 1656.' Bishop Ken, who has left his mark in stone and verse, was a Fellow of Winchester College. And did he not write for the boys of Wykeham's foundation

CHANTRY, WINCHESTER COLLEGE.

(Photograph by Mr. W. E. Abley, Winchester.)

Before treating of the organs and organists of the College we may refer to the constitution of the foundation. Wykeham's original charter was for the free education and board of seventy scholars. This number is still maintained, though each scholar has to pay a fee of £21 per annum. The Statutes required that all except the youngest should have separate beds. Consequently, at the opening of the College sixty-four bedsteads were ordered. These resting-places, made of oak, and costing one shilling each, were doubtless mere trays to hold the straw on which the scholars slept. About the year 1540 Dean Fleshmonger, of Chichester, at his own expense, replaced these bedsteads with others of oak, having heads or testers; one of these is now kept in Sixth Chamber as a curiosity. A fire which occurred in 1816 burnt up nineteen of these wooden bedsteads—'a good riddance,' the Bursar cheerfully records, 'as it had been found necessary for many years to kill the fleas in them with an infusion of coloquintida.' In addition to the 70 scholars on the foundation, all of whom wear gowns, there are about 340 other students, called Commoners, who reside in nine large houses in the occupation of Tutors. Thus the entire School consists of about 410 boys. The roll of Wykehamists contains many distinguished names—e.g., Sir Thomas Browne; the poets Collins, Warton, Young, Otway and Bowles; Lemprière, of the Dictionary; Arnold, of Rugby; Sydney Smith; Anthony Trollope; Lord Sherbrooke;

Frank Buckland, and Lord Selborne, the First Lord of the Admiralty.

The College has quite a vocabulary of its own. Here are a few examples:—

Toys=A small book-case and desk combined.

Continent=Confined to sick-room.

Abroad=Out of sick-room.

Cargo=A hamper of eatables sent to a boy by his friends.

Suction=Sweetmeats!

No article on Winchester College—especially in a journal devoted to music—would be complete without making mention of its famous school song 'Domum.' The tune is attributed to John Reading, organist of the College (and the Cathedral) at the end of the seventeenth century. The following notes on the singing of this ancient strain at the place of its origin are kindly supplied by Dr. Sweeting:—

The song, of which there are six verses, is sung at the end of the concerts preceding the Christmas and summer holidays. On the last day of the summer term it is also sung in College Meads, to the accompaniment of a band. At about seven o'clock in the evening the band begins to perform a programme of music. Domum is played at frequent intervals, when all gather round the band-stand and sing the melody lustily. Just before nine o'clock, all adjourn to Chamber Court, and there Domum is sung for the last time.

The tune was undoubtedly originally much plainer, but various ornamentations have, in process of time, gradually crept in. I give it as it is now sung, phrasing the melody only, as it is always sung in unison.

We may now consider the organs, quiristers, organists and music-masters of Wykeham's ancient foundation. The first organ—or 'pair of organs'—in the Chapel must have been small and of a portable nature, as on one occasion six scholars carried it to Bishop's Waltham, ten miles from Winchester, when Wykeham borrowed it during his sojourn there in 1399. It remained at Bishop's Waltham for eight years, till one William Wyke brought it back. In the meantime an organ was bought in London for £6 13s. 4d.; therefore from 1407 onwards the College indulged in the luxury of two organs—one stood in the Choir, the other in the rood-loft of the Chapel. The hire system as regards musical instruments seems to have had full play at Winchester College five centuries ago, as Cardinal Beaufort borrowed one of the organs to go to Farnham Castle in 1415, and five years later one was sent to Highclere, another of the Bishop of Winchester's seats. Concerning the removal to Highclere, the present Bursar in his invaluable *Annals—to which we are greatly indebted in the preparation of this article—gives as the bill of expenses, under date 1420:—

For a linen cloth purchased for covering the College organ and carrying it to Clere, 20*d.*

For two ash staves for carrying the said organ, 8*d.*

Fees to the men for carrying the said organ, 20*s.*

The expenses of William Wyke and others for carrying the said organ to Clere, 20*d.*

Both pairs of organs were repaired in 1498 at a cost of a trifle under a sovereign. Here is the disbursement entry:—

For the commons of Walter, the organ builder and his men in repairing 2 pairs of organs with 4 sets of bellows, over eight weeks, together with 20*d.* for fuel and faggots and 12*d.* for candles, 19*s.* 8*d.*

John Webbe, a Fellow of the College, gave, in 1520, an organ costing £13 6*s.* 7*d.*, which stood on the floor at the north side of the Choir. A large outlay for repairs appears in the accounts of the year 1542, set forth in a quaint detail thus:—

Paid Edmund Poppingay for various work upon the organ and bellows, 17*s.* 8*d.*

And for 13 sheep skins for the organ, 2*s.* 8*d.*

And for 6lbs. of glue, 16*d.*

Also 'pro j boxe pro le stoppe organorum' (probably the soundboard), 4*s.*

Paid to Nicolas, the joiner and his man for 5 days work upon the organ, 2*s.* 11*d.*

And for their commons, 20*d.*

Paid to Will^m. Dove, the organist, for overhauling the organ, £5.

And for his commons from Feb. 10 to July 16, 31*s.* 10*d.*

And for the commons of his man for 20 weeks, 23*s.* 4*d.*

Certain high jinks on the part of the lay-clerks and choir boys in 1567 are evident from an entry which reads:—

Paid Walter Powell for certain clamps for repairing the organ in the Choir damaged by the lay-clerks and quiristers, 9*s.*

A Mr. Barrow repaired the organ in 1637 at a cost of £80 12*s.* 6*d.*, when it was beautified externally at a cost of £32. Between the years 1647 and 1660 all mention of organs disappears from the records, but at the Restoration a sum of £26 was paid in 1661 to an unnamed artificer who put the instrument in order. In the year 1664, Thomas Harris, of Salisbury, rebuilt the organ at a cost of £154 6s. 5d. The new pipes were cast on the premises, as the accounts duly record:—

Mason and labourer, two days erecting furnace, and for 3 loads of sand to place it on, 6s. 8d.

Renatus Harris rebuilt the instrument in 1684-5—in its present position in the second window on the north side of the Choir—at a cost of £225. In 1780, Samuel Green appeared on the scene and rebuilt the organ according to the following specification:—

The above is the pedal-less organ upon which Dr. S. S. Wesley played during his organistship of the College. The present instrument—built by Messrs. Bishop and Son and enlarged by Messrs. Hill and Son—dates from 1875, but it still contains a few of Renatus Harris's stops.

Wykeham's original Statutes contain some interesting directions as to the musical staff of the College and the conduct of divine service. The foundation included three lay-clerks, each of their yearly stipends being 20s.; the cloth from which their long gowns with hood or cowl were made was not to cost more than 33s. 4d. per piece. Minute directions are given as to the conduct of the services according to the use of Sarum. Matins to be sung daily between the hours of 4 and 6 a.m.! The quiristers (the ancient spelling is retained at Winchester) are not mentioned in the original draft of the Statutes, possibly because their house was not ready for their reception. But they appear in the computus rolls within two years of the opening day. Wykeham decreed that sixteen quiristers, pauperes et indigentes like the Scholars, are to be chosen as objects of charity (intuitu charitatis). They are to sing in the choir, make the beds of the Fellows and Chaplains, and help the servants who wait at table. They are to be fed on the broken victuals, on the fragmenta et reliquiæ quæ superfuerunt de mensis presbyterorum et scolarium; but if this provision is not enough, it may be increased.

As early as the year 1397 these singing boys were in receipt of an allowance of 6d. each weekly, and if the value of the broken victuals be estimated at 2d. weekly, the provision for them was equal to that of the Scholars. Early in the seventeenth century the quiristers were allowed to live with their friends in the town, with the result that in 1631 the supervisors reported that they (1) Run about in hats, (2) Come not to school, (3) Few if any of them have surplices, (4) Only two or three can sing! This state of affairs continued till the year 1810, when the Warden and Fellows bought the lease of a house and put the quiristers into it under the superintendence of a master; in 1882 the present Choir School was built in Kingsgate Street. A former master of this school was the late Mr. William Whiting, author of the familiar hymn 'For those at sea' ('Eternal Father, strong to save'). The quiristers still wear a uniform, though it is not now made of 'blewe maydekyn,' 'blewe medley,' or 'grene medley,' of the fifteenth century; and although they are exempt from the bed-making duties of their predecessors, they still wait on the Scholars in Hall. It is said that Dr. Goddard—Headmaster from 1793 to 1809, and a munificent benefactor to the College—was formerly a quirister, and, coming to the present day, the most distinguished ex-quirister is Dr. George J. Bennett, organist of Lincoln Cathedral.

Wykeham made no provision for an organist in his statutes. The duty appertaining to that office appears to have been discharged by one of the three lay-clerks. It was not until the year 1542 that any payment to a regular organist appears in the Bursar's books, when one Robert Mose received a salary of £5 per annum; this amount (or one of £4) continued to be paid annually to the organist for more than a century. The first distinguished name on the roll of organists is increased from £5 to £50 per annum. To Reading succeeded Jeremiah (Jerry) Clark, composer of the tune 'St. Magnus,' who subsequently shot himself, through a love affair, during his organistship of St. Paul's Cathedral. For 170 years (1695 to 1865) the successive organists of Winchester Cathedral were also organists of that of Thomas Weelkes, the celebrated madrigal composer. Mr. Robert Pickhaver, organist from 1665 to 1678, received (in 1665) the sum of £4 9s. 6d. 'in payment for an instrument called le harpselen' (harpsichord). During the organistship of John Reading, from 1681 to 1692 (who held a similar post at the Cathedral), the salary was

Winchester College. The names include John Bishop, James Kent, Peter Fussell, Dr. G. W. Chard, and last, but not least, Samuel Sebastian Wesley. To accommodate these pluralists at the Sunday afternoon service in Chapel—which is fully choral and of the Cathedral type—the sermon always preceded Evening Prayer, a custom which has been continued to this day. There are Wykehamists who remember solemn moments of silence when, the sermon in Chapel being finished, masters and boys patiently awaited the arrival of Dr. Wesley from the Cathedral, when he would walk up the centre of the Chapel, in view of the onlookers, wearing a pair of white ducks! Dr. Kendrick Pyne, organist of Manchester Cathedral, formerly an articulated pupil of Wesley's at Winchester, recalls that in very wet weather Wesley carried 'an enormous gig umbrella of a vivid green colour! He frequently used to make me carry this huge gingham between rows of boys, to my great discomfiture; and I can see the sly twinkle in his eye as he turned round to me when we arrived at our destination at the East end.' White ducks and green umbrella!

Upon the removal of Wesley to Gloucester Cathedral in 1865 the two offices of Cathedral and College organist were separated—the late Dr. G. B. Arnold being appointed to the former post, and the late Mr. William Hutt becoming organist of the College, an office he held for thirty-six years.

The present Master of Music is Dr. Edward Thomas Sweeting. He was born at Alsager, Cheshire, on September 16, 1863. Upon the removal of his family to London, he, at the early age of eleven, became organist of St. Mary's Church, West Kensington. Two years later, having just entered his teens, he successfully competed for the Ward of Cripplegate Scholarship at the then recently-founded National Training School for Music, the precursor of the Royal College of Music. He was one of its earliest pupils, and remained there for six years (1876 to 1882); during the latter part of the time he held the Novello Scholarship. His teachers at Kensington were Dr. (now Sir) Frederick Bridge, Mr. John Francis Barnett, and Professor Prout, and he received much help and encouragement from kind-hearted Sir John Stainer. Among his fellow-students were Eugen D'Albert, Walter G. Alcock, Herbert F. Sharpe, Henry L. Balfour, and Frederick Cliffe.

In 1880 Dr. Sweeting qualified for the Fellowship of the Royal College of Organists, and two years later, on leaving the Training School, he began to look for an opening for professional work. His eye caught sight of an advertisement in THE MUSICAL TIMES of June, 1882, in which a music master was required for Rossall School, Lancashire. He applied for the post and got it—a good appointment for a young fellow of nineteen. At Rossall he spent fifteen happy years, taking the degree of Bachelor of Music in 1889, and that of Doctor in 1894, both at Oxford. Upon the death of Dr. G. M. Garrett in 1897 Dr. Sweeting became organist of St. John's College, Cambridge. This office he held for four years, until he became Master of Music at Winchester College, a post he worthily holds, and in which his ripe musicianship and long experience of public school life, no less than his enthusiasm for the art, will increasingly have full scope in so splendid a sphere of influence. Dr. Sweeting has an excellent assistant in Mr. H. V. Jervis, a former student of the Royal Academy of Music.

DOTTED CROCHET.

THE HARMONY OF DISCORD.

'The pain that is all but a pleasure will change to the pleasure that's all but a pain.' It was thus, in these words, that Gilbert might have expressed his feeling towards the musical inspiration of Arthur Sullivan, as certain correspondence, not yet made public, proves, though the quotation is from 'Patience.' For indeed the hurt of life, the injury which life does to one, is sometimes part of one's pleasure. In the ultimate appreciation of life a man has to depend rather upon the final results of his experience than upon the immediate suffering which he is compelled to endure. Those of us who understand what pain means, and who know exactly why pain is given to our bodies for the sake of something higher and loftier than anything, except possibly music, can give to us, realize that sentence absolutely and to its ultimate point. What is a discord? It is nothing more or less than that part of the science of music which, on account of this philosophical principle, tells the world precisely where and when it is necessary to begin to appreciate the curious and unintelligible way of pain in this most mysterious world. Pain and pleasure meet one another at every point in our career; and therefore it is that one is able to speak with no uncertain voice of the purest harmony which exists in the right kind of discord. As music has wandered through the world, so the brain of man has changed its attitude towards the idea of discord; he has deliberately accepted harshness and hardness in order to persuade himself that life is not altogether a means towards pleasure, but is to a large extent a method of realizing something of that ineffable mystery which has been involved in the extra-human sentiment and the extra-human intelligence ever since man began to speak of the things above his own experiences.

The organ has its great diapason, which in the hands of masters permits us to know how wonderfully the sentiment of music enters into the fine sentiment of that mathematical feeling which, in its ellipses, its parabolas, its hyperbolas, makes for all that is big in the movement of life, and for the swift motion of the world upon which we walk and with which we are concerned chiefly—even though we do not appreciate or understand the actual meaning of our swirl round space, a swirl which is absolutely identified with the musical feeling of things such as those which are impressed upon one as one travels along and understands the revolution of the planets. And what shall we now say of the harmony of discord? There is a sort of freemasonry in our life which invents rules and which makes a certain convention necessary for everything which we are empowered to do, even to think; but that freemasonry disappears from time to time, even though it reappears again and again. By this phrase we mean to say that the harmony of discord suddenly becomes the essential self of harmony, and that what is primarily a discordant note in a pure harmony inevitably grows, if it follow a sort of unearthly and as yet undiscovered rule, concordant. Unfortunately it happens that life is too often concerned with what may be called the preacher's 'business-way.' The preacher of course makes enemies. The very fact that Solomon was a preacher, as he tells us in that wonderful twelfth chapter of Ecclesiastes, shows that the discordant attitude of the public justifies the idea of harmony in discord.

Solomon probably knew life better than most men that have ever lived, chiefly because he was so intimately acquainted with many natures; his discords were realized in his actual phraseology, and therewith his harmony, which is a mass of realized discords, has been unconsciously imitated in recent days by all the wisdom of music. At the same time, we do not in the least wish to identify the character of any men of genius with the spirit of Solomon, who in any case did his best to give the world many inventions, and who at the same time proved himself to be the true son of one of the greatest poets who ever trod this earth, David the Psalmist.

The growth of discord in music is obviously a growth which runs parallel with the increased complexity of brain that has distinguished the modern evolution of science. In the beginning, men were content with the simple singing in unison which marks the earlier developments of song. Now and then it must happen that a sport makes its appearance in the world; and we find such an example in 'Sumer is icumen in.' Here however it is clear that the effort of that monastic body which is supposed to be responsible for the composition of the work lay in an attempt to efface any thought of discord which might exist in a combination of voices singing in different intervals. Then very slowly, and after a great reaction of musical feeling, there seems to have come upon the Western ideal a feeling of pain, the character of which has already been described in the quotation wherewith I began this article. There is no doubt that when the first resolution of discords was conceived, by some lingering meditative spirit, it was hailed without any enthusiasm, and without any of the final pleasure which has greeted in so many ways that particular idea in musical writing. And so one works the parallel throughout the kingdom of music; as in the stately procession of kings which passed before Macbeth's startled eyes, one notes an endless progressiveness, yet, in essence, one marks the intimacies of the musical art which this Western world has chosen to take unto itself. Discord in harmony, harmony in discord—by these positive and negative poles there is wrought out for our human souls a wisdom of science which has by no means yet reached its ultimate height. The philosophy of music bears itself thus bravely through the world, partly in the teaching of happiness, and partly in the teaching of pain; which of the two is the better issue must remain, so far as our knowledge is concerned, an unassailable secret. But it seems to be one of the newer gospels of mankind that there should be no fulfilment without renunciation, that there should be no happiness without denial, and that therefore the more acute the relief from the pain of inspired music that lies in the womb of futurity, the more absolute will be the ultimate pleasure therefrom to be born.

VERNON BLACKBURN.

WAGNERIAN MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

A LETTER WRITTEN TO WAGNER BY

Some of the most forlorn aspects of modern life are to be found in England. Watch the districts inhabited by working men in London, get a glimpse of the interior of the shops in the poorer neighbourhoods, and you will be convinced these people must take up music in sheer self-defence; they will cling to it like one drowning in a sea of ugliness. Again, at the opposite end of the social scale, where the presence of accumulated wealth for generations has fostered a natural aristocracy of luxurious habits and prone to over-refinement of feeling as of manner, music of a manly, heroic cast seems particularly wanted. The sort of music, estimable of its kind, that has hitherto touched this portion of English society, has acted rather as a gentle opiate, an additional condiment to the tea table. Let Beethoven resound in these quarters, instead of Promenades d'un Solitaire; let the C minor Symphony rouse the slumbering spirits, as it is beginning to do, and we shall soon see the 'delicate-handed, dilettante priest,' who intones in Tennyson's 'Maud,' reinvigorated and transfigured. And if, as Schopenhauer has it, the musician expresses the highest wisdom in a language his intellect does not understand, it might perhaps not be so inept to look upon English utilitarian philosophy, with its 'greatest happiness for the greatest number,' as a comment towards which the A major Symphony or the Pastorale might stand in the position of the text. And further still, if by-and-bye that text were to call forth comments of a more ideal character than those furnished by the current materialism or utilitarianism, would it be a matter for regret?

The chaotic state of English musical culture, with its unmistakable tendency towards amelioration—one must conceive of it as though it were seen through a lens—is apparent if one watches the ebullition that has taken hold of the mass of professionals. Among our younger musical men there are, indeed, few whose mental horizon has not been extended beyond the confines of 'mere music'; and this, assuredly, will tell upon the quality of their work. That the technical attainments of English musicians are fully up to the mark of their Continental brethren was curiously shown when the so-called 'Festival Orchestra' of two hundred artists for the [Wagner] concerts at the Albert Hall was got together from all nooks and corners of London. It was the time, early in May, when the two Italian Operas, the Crystal and Alexandra Palaces, the Philharmonic Societies, the host of theatres, were in full swing, and when one would suppose every competent artist in the land to be occupied with his regular duties. Well, after some little trouble, the two hundred artists were found,—Englishmen born, for the most part—and they played the most arduous portions of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' in a manner to call forth repeated expressions of approbation from the master. Such a fact needs no comment; and other facts, proving a similar highly creditable average of technical attainment, might easily be adduced.

The sad thing, however, about it all is that so much of genuine artistic power should be more or less wasted for want of a proper sphere of action and of proper organization. We are in want of a centre, a formative institution that should hold up an ideal standard and should not be continuously oscillating between one expedient and another to make both ends meet. We are rarely, hardly ever, independent of immediate financial success. This is the sore point with us. The commercial spirit is apt to vitiate everything of a public nature which a musician may undertake. The fatal question, 'Is it self-supporting; does it pay?'— that final test which the English mind rightly applies to all practical undertakings and business matters—it has not yet learnt to regard as inapplicable to matters of art. Thus, in spite of the capacity and energy so frequently shown by English musicians, and notwithstanding the intelligent sympathy with true music that the cultivated laity are always ready to evince, we are paralyzed by the spectre 'Finance.' And it is impossible to see a way out of this state of things until the plain truth comes to be recognised that music and money have no standard of value in common.*

The same thing holds good with regard to theatrical performances. We have had the artists of the Comédie Française with us, and have felt the fascination of performances correct in all details; and we have deplored that our own best actors, whose individual gifts and attainments are in no wise inferior to those of our French guests, should be unable to offer anything approaching the consistent and homogeneous style of their performances. But we chose to ignore the significant point that the Comédie Française is intended to represent French art at its best, and accordingly that it may perhaps pay, but it is not primarily meant to pay. It has never been the practice of the British Government directly to aid artistic institutions; and it would be Utopian to hope for a change of policy in this respect. As a matter of fact, however, private resources in England are plentiful enough to do both for music and for the stage that which has been done so well for the Théâtre Français, if only the urgent need of action in such a direction were once clearly seen and felt.

A reference to music and the stage in Germany does not, as a rule, strike an Englishman as being particularly apt if the conversation happens to turn upon the proper means to mend matters at home. If he has resided for any length of time at any of the larger German cities, he will say that the pecuniary assistance which German princes and town councils give to their theatres may have rendered the performance of plays better, but has left those of opera rather below the average of what he can get for his money in London. Moreover, the German stage suffers from a plethora of performances; and he fails to see how people contrive to change and to wind and unwind their repertoire so incessantly without getting out of breath. As to concerts, he cannot, as a rule, admit that such things are worse in London than elsewhere; and he knows well enough that whatever there may be of individual excellence as player or singer, abroad, is sure to come to London some time or other—be it only to gather guineas, or to abuse the place if none be forthcoming. To all of which one can but assent. But if, in the end, one points to Bayreuth, and tries to evoke sympathy with the aims embodied there, it usually takes some time before he can be got to see what is meant. He supposes himself to be the

* We have now, thanks to the zeal and influence of King Edward VII., got the Royal College, founded in 1882, and much else besides.

'man in the street'; he attempts to get a glimpse of the German spirit, which, he is told, has found its ideal expression on the Bayreuth stage; and he looks dubious. He interprets German spirit by some figure of the Empire under a Prussian helmet, or attempts some witticism à la Byron about 'gin and true religion'—and anyway, he fails to see how such a spectre could move to the sounds of the invisible orchestra. The scarecrows of the press, and of German public life generally, trouble him less; and what else is there?—the universities, theatres, concert-rooms, or, perhaps, the beer gardens? One has to explain that the pure Teutonic spirit is to be sought in the works of the great men of Germany; that it is actually alive in the heart of the nation, too, though in public it may appear under queer disfigurements, its voice almost stifled amidst the noise of the day; that it once resided under Martin Luther's cap and the periwig of Sebastian Bach, shone from the forehead of Kant and Schopenhauer, flashed from the eyes of Goethe and Schiller, and still resounds in the symphonies of Beethoven; that the German nation assimilated a part of the spirit's message, forgot a part, and passed by the rest; and, finally, that it is again spreading its wings for a great flight.

In England, as in France, people are accustomed to see so little discrepancy between the average culture of the nation and the tendencies of representative men, that it is difficult for them to realize how in Germany the presence of untoward circumstances should have brought about an ideal tendency in the best minds. But this tendency led them towards the discovery of types of art which are free from conventionalities, yet as truly German as 'Faust' or the Ninth Symphony. And a step farther is still more difficult; for it becomes necessary to acknowledge that the fostering of such an ideal is of great importance to all men, and that it specially concerns a nation whose culture is so intimately connected with that of Germany as is England's.

Content with having pointed this out, the issue may be put on the simpler ground that the best thing in the way of art Germany has to offer is music; that the modern drama, permeated by music, has risen to undreamt-of heights; and as in art example is better than theoretical teaching, so the examples set at Bayreuth may act as germs and bear good fruit in all Europe and beyond the sea—let them only be judiciously fostered.

A friend of mine who went to Bayreuth in 1876, without knowing exactly what he was about, subsequently reported himself to have felt like Saul, the son of Kish, who went forth to seek his father's donkeys, and found a kingdom.

As beauty is not beauty without virtue: so music is not music without art.

As all things love their likes: so the more curious the ear, the delicatest music.

FRANCIS MERES (1565-1647).

Occasional Notes.

Music, all-powerful o'er the human mind,
Can still each mental storm, each tumult calm,
Soothe the anxious care on sleepless couch reclined,
And e'en fierce anger's furious rage disarm.

At her command the various passions lie;
She stirs to battle, or she lulls to peace,
Melts the charm'd soul to thrilling ecstasy,
And bids the jarring world's harsh clangour cease.

Soft through the dell the dying strains retire,
Then burst majestic in the varied swell;
Now breathe melodious as the Grecian lyre,
Or on the ear in sinking cadence dwell.

Oh! surely melody from heaven was sent
To cheer the soul when tired with human strife:
To soothe the wayward heart by sorrow rent,
And soften down the rugged road of life.

HENRY KIRKE WHITE.

The announcement that the 'long lost' score of Wagner's 'Rule, Britannia' Overture has been suddenly discovered at Leicester must be received with restrained enthusiasm. In the first place, it has long been known to a small circle that a set of orchestral parts of the overture is in the possession of a private collector in London; and, secondly, in 1899 Madame Wagner informed an English correspondent that a copy—probably autograph—of the score is at Bayreuth, and that it 'is not intended for publicity.' Wagner composed the work at Königsberg late in the year 1836, or early in 1837, but there is nothing in the Wagner literature to account for his having selected the theme of Arne's famous song as the subject of an overture. He was then twenty-three years of age, and, although miserably poor, he, on November 24, 1836, married—'for worse' rather than 'for better'—Christine Wilhelmine Planer. 'The year I passed at Königsberg,' he records, 'was completely lost to my art through the pettiest cares. I wrote one solitary Overture, Rule, Britannia.' The work was performed, under the composer's direction, at some orchestral concerts given in the crush-room of the theatre at Königsberg in March, 1837, but it attracted little notice. With the exception of a repetition performance at a 'vocal and instrumental concert,' got up by Wagner in the concert-hall of the Schwarzhäupterhaus, Riga, on March 19, 1838, the Overture drops out of knowledge.

In the chronological lists of works compiled by Mr. Edward Dannreuther as an appendix to his admirable article on Wagner in Grove's 'Dictionary'—an article written twenty years ago—the following information is given:—

Overture, 'Rule, Britannia.' Unpublished. Written at Königsberg, 1836. Score was sent to the London Philharmonic Society in 1840. (Apparently lost.)

No one is better qualified to speak on Wagner matters in England than Mr. Dannreuther, by whom Wagner was hospitably entertained during his third (and last) visit to England—April 30 to June 4, 1877. We therefore wrote to Mr. Dannreuther asking him to give his opinion upon the Leicester discovery. In reply he writes: 'Wagner, so far as I can remember, never mentioned "Rule, Britannia" to me. Some ten or more years ago Frau Cosima Wagner wrote several times, as the rumours that the score was in existence consolidated themselves. I

The name of Hans Pfitzner is as yet hardly known in England. In Germany, on the other hand, he is hailed by a small band of enthusiasts as the greatest living German composer, and as there is no doubt that his fame is gradually spreading throughout the Fatherland, it would seem as if he could not be much longer ignored in this country. Hans Pfitzner was born on May 5, 1869, of German parents, in Moscow, where his father was an orchestral player and conductor. His mother was an excellent pianist and a pupil of Alexander Villoing, the teacher of Anton and Nicolas Rubinstein. In 1878 Pfitzner senior became a conductor at the Frankfort-on-Main Theatre, and the boy Hans studied with Iwan Knorr and James Kwast at the Hoch'sche Conservatoire. As a student he composed some incidental music to Ibsen's drama 'Das Fest auf Solhang.' Since then he has produced two operas, 'Der arme Heinrich' (Mainz, 1895), and 'Die Rose vom Liebesgarten' (Elberfeld, 1901), besides chamber music, songs, a Ballad for baritone solo and orchestra, 'Herr Oluf' (Op. 12), and a second (humorous) Ballad for bass solo and orchestra, 'Die Heinzelmännchen' (Op. 14), which was first produced at a Pfitzner concert given recently, under the composer's direction, by the newly-founded and very enterprising Musikalische Gesellschaft of Essen. The gifted composer, who, like most artists with a 'message,' has had to wait long for the world's acknowledgment of his genius, met with an enthusiastic reception in Kruppland, and such an excellent critic as Herr Max Hehemann refers to him in a glowing article in the local Generalanzeiger as 'one of our great ones' and 'a master.' Who will be the first, we wonder, to give one of Pfitzner's important works a hearing in England? Or must we wait again till all the world rings with his praise?

Our Manchester correspondent sends the following correction in regard to the Hallé Orchestra Pension Fund:—

The Hon. Secretary of this Fund (Mr. Carl Fuchs) has pointed out certain errors of detail in my last month's letter to THE MUSICAL TIMES. Those errors must of course be corrected, and as it seems probable that the fortunes of the Fund in question—the first of its kind to be established in Britain—will in course of time acquire historical importance, I may perhaps be allowed to throw the corrections into the form of a brief statement, showing how the scheme fares now in the fifth year since its initiation. Of the five trustees, three are members of the Orchestra and two represent the Executive of the 'Hallé Concerts Society'; but the committee of five which actually administers the Fund consists exclusively of members of the Orchestra. The sources from which the Fund is derived are three in number: (1) Regular contributions by members of the Orchestra, (2) proceeds of the annual benefit concert held at the close of the Hallé season, (3) donations of patrons and friends. On joining the Pension Fund a member pays an entrance fee of two shillings for every year of his age, and an annual subscription of one shilling for every year of his age. He can begin drawing his pension at sixty or, deferring retirement and continuing the subscription, can afterwards draw an increased pension. At the annual benefit concert the services of all members who have joined the Fund, as well as of the conductor (Dr. Richter), are given gratuitously. This year the services of the soloists at the Pension Fund Concert—Miss Marie Brema and Mr. Webster Millar—were also given gratuitously. The Fund is under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty the Queen, who made a donation of £100 at the time of the Orchestra's visit to London in connection with the Elgar Festival at Covent Garden. The list of others from whom donations have been received includes a large number of past and present members of the Orchestra, several artists who have appeared as solo performers at the Hallé concerts, and some of the composers whose works have been performed. The word 'benevolent' which originally figured in the title of the Fund has now been expunged.

Mr. Henry J. Wood has resigned the Conductorship of the Sheffield Musical Festival of 1905, in order that he may devote his energies to the Queen's Hall Orchestra, with the notable achievements of which his name is so worthily associated.

The Competition movement is one that deserves full recognition and every encouragement. There can be no doubt that, wisely directed, these competitions are productive of the greatest good in promoting a love of music, and moreover that the vein thus worked is rich in untold possibilities. We have therefore much pleasure in calling attention to the report (on page 392) of a meeting recently held at which the subject has taken a new form, one in which the usefulness of so commendable a feature in our musical life will be both stimulated and strengthened.

A correspondent writes: 'What is the meaning of Hydropathetic?' He adds: 'I read in a certain musical journal that, at a conference of musicians recently held at Dunblane, "the members entered heartily into the social life and recreations of the Hydropathetic." As the conference met at a Hydropathic establishment, I am wondering whether the members were "treated" to a diluted version of Tschaikovsky's famous Symphony, named, for this occasion only, "Hydropathetic." What say you, Mr. Editor?' Our correspondent appears to have given a very natural solution of the matter. Perhaps a very pathetic and peripatetic (not peripathetic, please Mr. Printer) speaker at that conference may have used the term 'Hydropathetic' as a Tschaikowskyan example of Hydrometamorphism.

'Shall I modulate to B, or not to B?' soliloquised the youth as he composed his 'Hamlet' Overture

ANTONIN DVORÁK.

With much regret we place on record the death of Antonin Dvorák, which occurred with startling suddenness at Prague on May-Day. The master-musician had been suffering for some time from an internal trouble, but he was getting better. He had sat down to dinner on the day of his death, and as his wife placed the food before him he fainted and never regained consciousness.

The son of an innkeeper, Antonin Dvorák was born on April 8, 1841, at Nelahozeves, a village on the Moldau, one of the quietest of places, not far from Prague. Passionately fond of music, the boy received some rudimentary lessons in singing and violin playing from Josef Spitz, the village schoolmaster. At the age of twelve he was sent to live with an uncle at Zlonic, where he studied the organ under one Liehmann, who, as Mr. Hadow tells us, 'deserves some honourable mention as having been the first to discover evidences of unusual capacity in his shy, simple-hearted pupil.' In 1855, aged sixteen, the youth removed to Böhmisch-Kamnitz, where he learnt German and further studied the organ under Hancke. Mr. Dvorák then told his music-loving son that he must consider his education as finished, as he wanted another hand to carry on his publican's trade, the father having opened a larger establishment at Zlonic. Every entreaty and protest against the decision of Dvorák père was unavailing. However, Antonin, who had hitherto given proof of his abilities only as an executant, determined to try the force of his composing gifts, such as they were at that time. To quote from Mr. Hadow:—

He therefore prepared his last appeal in the shape of an original polka; copied the band parts, distributed them secretly among the Zlonic musicians, and, after a few days of breathless anticipation, launched his coup de théâtre for the conversion of an unexpectant household.

It is better to draw a veil over the performance. The composer did not know that the trumpet is a transposing instrument: strings and wood-wind contended strenuously in different keys; there was an agonized moment of jagged and excruciating discord; and it is not surprising that the family remained unconvinced.*

A year later, finding his position intolerable, Dvorák, aged sixteen, cast off the publican's yoke, and set forth for Prague in October, 1857. He entered the organ school there, and for three years worked very hard at his studies. Like Wagner and Berlioz in their early days, he was miserably poor—so 'hard up,' indeed, that, backs, this youth of grit and perseverance worked on with unabating enthusiasm, with the result that in 1860 he graduated second prizeman of the year at the Organ School.

In 1862 he became a member of the orchestra of the National Theatre at Prague, where he greatly benefited by his intercourse with Smetana, who held the conductorship from 1866 to 1874. Another friend was Carl Bendl. Upon obtaining the appointment of organist of St. Adalbert's Church, Prague, in 1873, Dvorák gave up his orchestral post and took unto himself a wife, though his circumstances were of in order to obtain the bare necessities of life, 'he joined a small band of some twenty performers and went about with them, earning a meagre pittance at the cafés and restaurants of the city.' On Sundays he played the viola at a private chapel—these two engagements bringing in a wage of rather more than thirty shillings a month! He could not even afford to hire a pianoforte, and the purchase of music-paper was a luxury; but in spite of all these draw-the humblest description. He did not come before the public as a composer till his thirty-second year, when he set to music the patriotic hymn 'Die Erben des weissen Berges' (The heirs of the white mountain). The full-score of this work bears on its title-page the following: 'dedicated with feelings of deep gratitude to the English people.' He then wrote one work after another with surprising rapidity and marked originality. His genius and his poverty then became known, and he was granted a pension of about £50 a year from the Kultusministerium, a timely and well-bestowed pecuniary aid that brought him under the notice of Brahms. The publication (in 1878) of a series of 'Slavische Tänze' for pianoforte duet spread his fame far and wide. Thenceforth he followed the career of a composer, with what success is well known. From 1892 to 1895 he was Director of the National Conservatoire of Music in New York, where he wrote his famous 'New World Symphony.' Dvorák's compositions, which embrace every department of music, are characterized with distinct freshness of melodic and rhythmic treatment; the dramatic instinct is strong in all his creations. His 'Stabat Mater' is a noble example of his powers, while on the other hand the charm of his gipsy songs, with their quaint rhythms and intervals, testifies to the versatility of his genius.

It is not surprising to find—so far as can be ascertained—that the name of Dvorák first appeared in an English concert programme at the Crystal Palace, and that Sir (then Mr.) August Manns was, as he has so often been, the pioneer in introducing the Bohemian master's compositions to an English audience. At the Saturday concert of February 15, 1879, the Slavonian Dances for orchestra were performed at Sydenham. THE MUSICAL TIMES, in a notice of the concert, said:—

Three Slavonian Dances by Anton Dvorák, a composer new to this country, concluded the concert. These interesting little pieces are somewhat similar in style to Brahms's Hungarian Dances, the national characteristics being strongly prominent. They are excellently orchestrated, and produced a favourable impression.

On March 10, 1883, at St. James's Hall, the London Musical Society—an amateur organization conducted by the late Sir Joseph Barnby—gave the first performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' in England. So greatly were its beauties appreciated that the composer accepted an invitation to conduct his devotional setting of the hymn at the Albert Hall on March 13, 1884, his first visit to this country. In September of the same year he conducted the work at the Worcester Musical Festival. For the Birmingham Festival of 1885 he composed his popular cantata 'The Spectre's Bride,' that of 'St. Ludmila' for Leeds in 1886, and his Requiem for Birmingham in 1891, all these performances being conducted by Dvorák in person. In 1891 the University of Cambridge conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. Therefore the statement made by the Secretary of the Philharmonic Society that 'Each time he came to England it was at the Society's expense, and each time to conduct works from his pen at the Philharmonic Concerts,' is erroneous. His appearances at the Society's concerts were on March 20, 1884, April 22 and May 6, 1885, April 24, 1890, and March 19, 1896.

On the occasion of his first visit to England (in 1884) Dvorák was the guest of Mr. Oscar Beringer, who invited him to his house through a mutual friend. As the composer would not venture to cross the Channel alone, he brought with him his friend Heinrich von Káan, an excellent musician and professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatorium of Music at Prague. 'Neither Dvorák, who stayed with me for a month,' recalls Mr. Beringer for the purposes of this article, 'nor Káan could speak a word of English. Dvorák, used to get up at five o'clock in the morning—a little awkward hour in an English household—and call for his friend Káan, who had a room close by my house. They would then stroll about London together. One fine morning however they lost their way. "I feel hungry," said Káan, as they passed a big place in the windows of which breakfast tables were appetisingly exposed to view. "This must be a café, let us go in." They did, and after they had hung up their hats they ordered breakfast. The waiters could not understand German, and after some time it was explained to the intruders that the building was not a café but a club, and that therefore their wants could not be supplied. Káan said to me afterwards: "I have been in Paris, Berlin, and Vienna, and had never before seen so magnificent a café as that." No wonder, I thought, as, above all clubs in the West-End, they had ordered their breakfast at the Athenæum!" Another anecdote of this initial visit to England is related by Mr. Beringer. At the Albert Hall performance of the 'Stabat Mater,' which was conducted by Dvorák in 1884, Barnby's 'The Lord is King' was performed. 'That was in E,' said Dvorák; 'No, in E flat,' replied Mr. Beringer. 'I'll bet you anything you like it was in E,' retorted Dvorák, indignant at being corrected; the high pitch used by the Albert Hall had then to be explained to him by Mr. Beringer.

The remains of the distinguished composer were laid to rest in the cemetery at Prague. The public funeral was of an imposing nature, and attended by immense crowds. Dvorák has left a family of five children, three sons and two daughters. One of the latter is married to M. Suk, of the Bohemian String Quartet, and the other is a singer at the Czech National Theatre.

The photograph of Dvorák which accompanies this article was taken during one of the visits of the composer to Westwood House, Sydenham, the residence of the late Mr. Henry Littleton.

HONOURING DR. JOACHIM.

Brilliant, representative, and enthusiastic was the huge audience assembled under the roof of Queen's Hall on the evening of May 16 to pay honour to Dr. Joachim. The occasion, to celebrate the Diamond Jubilee of the eminent violinist's first appearance in England, was unique in more ways than one. The Prime Minister (Mr. Balfour), a true lover of music, spared time from his parliamentary duties in order to preside over that remarkable function. The proceedings were opened with the performance, by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Henry J. Wood, of the 'Hebrides' Overture by Mendelssohn, to whom Dr. Joachim referred as his father in music. The hero of the evening, with Mr. Balfour and Sir Hubert Parry, then made his way to the platform, the entire audience rising and cheering vociferously. Sir Hubert Parry then read an address to Dr. Joachim which contained the following references to his artistic career in this country:—

It was under the auspices of Mendelssohn that you played Beethoven's Violin Concerto at the Philharmonic Society's concert of May 27th, 1844. No combination could have been more prophetic of your career, though neither its duration in time nor the singular quality of its achievement was then within any probable foresight.

Learning from Mendelssohn and Schumann, and working with Brahms in the comradeship of life-long friends, you have devoted your whole energies, as executant and as composer, to continuing the tradition and maintaining the ideal of classic music.

We now hold it fitting that the sixtieth anniversary of your first appearance here should not pass without a special greeting. The welcome we offer you is alike for the artist who commands every power of the trained hand, and for the musician whose consummate knowledge and profound reverence for his art have uniformly guided his execution in the path of the sincerest interpretation. Your first thoughts as a performer have ever been for the composer and not for yourself. In no hour have you yielded to the temptation of mere personal display, and the weight of your precepts in one of the greatest musical schools of Europe is augmented by the absolute fidelity with which your example illustrates them.

Mr. Balfour next addressed the vast assembly, preluding his remarks with a reference to his 'old friend and schoolfellow, Sir Hubert Parry.' The Prime Minister, in the course of his tribute to the genius of Dr. Joachim, said: 'Wherever there are ears to hear, and wherever there are interpreters to interpret, there the joy which music is capable of giving may be enjoyed, irrespective of nation, irrespective, I had almost said, but certainly untrammelled by the barriers of space and the barriers of language.' He then went on to speak of the masterful interpretations with which Dr. Joachim has for so many years made us familiar, and in conclusion he said:—

But I should very inaccurately express the feelings of this great assembly, and I should assuredly be very inaccurately expressing my own, if I were to pretend for one moment that we have looked at you merely as a great artist. Ever since that happier time when I had more opportunities of enjoying the great masterpieces of music than now fall to my lot, your annual visit to England was not merely a thing looked forward to as an occasion of a great æsthetic pleasure. We felt that a friend was coming among us. And I think that the great and beneficent influence which you have had on British music is due not merely to those high artistic qualities of which the Address gives a worthy description, but also to that human affection which it is your peculiar and supreme gift to elicit, and which so many of us have enjoyed through longer years than I care now to enumerate. For it is as the friend as much as the musician, as the musician as much as the friend, that we now desire to pay all the honour which it is within our power to give you; and, as some simple memorial, some permanent monument of this memorable night, I now beg to present you on behalf of this assembly with a portrait which will, I hope, serve to remind you of the many friends whom, I will not say you have left in England, but whom you have in England, and will keep in England—among whom you have enjoyed, through long years, unflinching popularity since, two generations ago, you first came among us.

Mr. Balfour then presented Dr. Joachim with his portrait, painted by Mr. J. S. Sargent, R.A., which had been subscribed for by many admirers of the great violinist as a man and as an artist. Dr. Joachim, who was again most cordially received, acknowledged the gift in modest, but well-expressed terms of appreciative thanks. He said, speaking in English: 'We have heard the lovely Overture [the 'Hebrides'] which was inspired in Mendelssohn by British scenery, and it is a great joy to think that he, who always watched over my artistic career, was the means of bringing me to this country, which I have ever felt to be a second home to me. . . . On such an occasion as this, one is apt to think of what one would have wished to accomplish, but which has been left untouched. But it is some consolation to find that still there is the gratitude of kind and generous friends, who think, after all, I have done something.'

An interesting selection of music concluded the proceedings of this memorable occasion—one that will not soon be forgotten:—

Violin Concerto Beethoven.

DR. JOACHIM.

Abendlied (from Op. 85) Schumann.

(Arranged for solo violin and orchestra by Joseph Joachim.)

DR. JOACHIM.

Overture to Shakespeare's 'King Henry IV.'

(Second Part) in C major (Op. 7) Joachim.

Akademische Fest-Ouverture in C minor

(Op. 80) Brahms.

The two compositions last named were conducted by Dr. Joachim, the remainder of the music being under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood.

An exceedingly pleasant and surprising incident of the evening was the presentation to Dr. Joachim of an enormous crown-shaped floral tribute by Franz von Vecsey. The veteran violinist was so touched by this expression of affection on the part of the wonderful prodigy fiddler, that he kissed the little fellow, who we hope may in the year 1964 celebrate his diamond jubilee under similar circumstances.

In order to correct some mis-statements concerning Dr. Joachim's earliest appearances in England, we place on record a few facts derived from authentic sources. He made his debut at a monster benefit given by 'the poet' Bunn at Drury Lane Theatre, on March 28, 1844. The youthful violinist, then nearly thirteen years of age, was announced thus—

The celebrated Hungarian Boy, MASTER JOACHIM, will make his first appearance before an English Public, and perform Grand Variations for the violin, on a theme from Rossini's Otello, by Ernst.

He made at least three appearances before the memorable Philharmonic concert of May 27—at the Societa Armonica concert of April 22, at the Melodists' Club (at which he dined) three days later, and at Madame Caradori-Allan's concert of May 17. During his first visit to London he played at concerts or soirées given by Mrs. Anderson, Hausmann (the violoncellist), G. A. Macfarren and J. W. Davison, Miss Alicia Nunn, Madame Dulcken, John Parry (the comic singer), Purdy, and Benedict. In the many appreciative notices of his playing we find such expressions as 'extraordinary little Joachim'; 'he played perfectly in tune—a compliment we were unable to pay to Ernst—and with a correct conception of his author, his reading of it, indeed, was occasionally very fine; he is the best youthful violinist we have heard,' and so on. An interesting anecdote of this his first visit to London, related by Dr. Joachim to the writer of the biographical sketch of him which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of April, 1898, may be repeated in connection with this Diamond Jubilee celebration:—

At a concert given by Mr. Purdey, at Radley's Hotel, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, on June 5, 1844, Mendelssohn was announced to play his D minor Trio with Master Joachim and Mr. Hancock. 'It so happened,' relates Dr. Joachim, 'that only the violin and violoncello parts had been brought to the concert-room, and Mendelssohn was rather displeased at this; but he said, "Never mind, put any book on the piano, and someone can turn from time to time, so that I need not look as though I played by heart." Nowadays, when people put such importance on playing or conducting without a book, I think this might be considered a good moral lesson of a great musician's modesty. He evidently did not like to be in too great a prominence before his partners in the Trio. He was always truly generous!'

Scottish friends and admirers (to the number of 150) of Dr. Joachim presented him with an illuminated address and a silver laurel wreath at Edinburgh on April 27. In presenting the address—which referred to the distinguished violinist as 'one who combines the genius of an artist with the best qualities of a man, nobility, earnestness, conscientiousness, devotion, and love'—Professor Niecks made some exceedingly happy remarks, concluding with the words that Dr. Joachim 'was a striking example of the proof that all great, all true art had its roots in the nature and character of the producer. The secret of the magic of his art, he might say, was his character as a man—and that character determined the tone of the public's relation to him, and the nature of that relation was that his character made the public his friends as well as his admirers.' Dr. Joachim, in reply, said that he thought he owed this charming surprise to the kindness of devoted friends for 'auld lang syne' more than to his poor merits. He could only say how deeply he felt the honour they had bestowed upon him: and the honour came all the more home to him as it was offered him in the capital of a country which had given to the world so many immortal strains of music—tender, chivalrous, fiery melodies that would live in the hearts of all the musical world long after more elaborate works would have ceased to find an echo.

BROADWOODIANA.

The ancient house of Broadwood have celebrated in an unusually interesting manner the transference of their business premises from the historic spot in Great Pulteney Street (dating from 1732) to the new and handsome abode in Conduit Street. A feature of the house-warming was an exhibition of old keyboard instruments, which remained on view for a fortnight during May. The exhibits were admirably arranged in chronological order, so that the visitor was able to trace the evolution of the modern pianoforte—a metamorphosis with which the name of Broadwood is so honourably associated. Antiquity is veritably an attribute of the clavichord, which Viridung described in the year 1511, and for which Bach composed his celebrated 'Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues.' Koch, in his Lexicon, refers to this old-time instrument as 'the comfort of the sufferer and the sympathising friend of cheerfulness'; and not only was it highly favoured by Bach, but Beethoven said that 'of all keyed instruments the clavichord was that upon which he could best control tone and expression.' The Privy-purse expenses of Elizabeth of York, A.D. 1502, mention 'A straungier that gave the Quene a payre of clavycordes.' The specimen exhibited by Messrs. Broadwood, apparently of English manufacture, was made in the year 1770.

The spinet—which differs from the clavichord in that its strings are plucked by small quills instead of a brass tangent—is the next in order as one of the precursors of the pianoforte, and the instrument shown at Conduit Street—a very beautiful specimen and in perfect order—made in 1710 by Hitchcock, of London. To the spinet succeeded the harpsichord. The importance of this instrument in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was very great, it being much used in conjunction with other instruments. It was usually made with three strings to each note, and comprised two keyboards, and the stops and other mechanical contrivances greatly increased the scope of this delightful old-world instrument. The Ruckers family of Antwerp—circa 1575—were famous craftsmen who brought the manufacture of the harpsichord to perfection. The Ruckers traditions were brought to England by a Fleming named Tabel, and became the basis of harpsichord making in this country. Three fine specimens were exhibited. One of these, made by Andries Ruckers, a grandson of Hans (1651), was formerly the property of Handel, who must often have played upon it at his house in Brook Street close by; Handel bequeathed it to his friend and amanuensis, Christopher Smith: it now belongs to the South Kensington Museum, and was kindly lent to the Exhibition. Another, also a two-manual instrument, but manufactured by Burkart Schudi (1771), was formerly the property of his (Schudi's) daughter, who became Barbara Broadwood. Schudi (or Tschudi), the founder of the Broadwood house and a pupil of Tabel, became the greatest master of the harpsichord craft in the eighteenth century. He not only added much to the power and scope of the instrument, but patented, in 1769, the Venetian swell, an invention afterwards adapted to the organ with great advantage.

The pianoforte, dating from about the year 1709, was invented, harpsichord shape, in Italy by Cristofori. Later on Silbermann introduced it into Germany; but it was not till about 1760 that Johann Zumpe, who had been in Tschudi's (or Shudi's) workshop, made it known in England. Zumpe favoured an oblong shape; from it was derived the square type of pianoforte which remained in vogue for about a century. The Zumpe pianoforte in the exhibition—one of the earliest square pianofortes manufactured in England (1766)—was made expressly for Dr. Crotch, and its keyboard is evidently an experimental one, an attempt at equal temperament. The earliest mention in the Broadwood records of a pianoforte is of one sent to a Miss Pelham, at BRIGHTHELMSTONE (Brighton), on August 9, 1770. A grand pianoforte having a Venetian swell was manufactured by John Broadwood and Sons about 1813—a link between the harpsichord and the modern household instrument. Other Broadwood 'grands' of interest that were shown included the instrument used by Chopin during his visit to London in 1849; the fine pianoforte made for Sir Alma Tadema in 1879; and that supplied (in 1880) to Mr. Burne Jones, a notable instrument richly decorated with the story of Orpheus.

The upright pianoforte was invented in 1800 by John Isaac Hawkins, who, by-the-way, was not a pianoforte manufacturer. This invention soon gave place to the type originated by Southwell in 1804, called the Cabinet pianoforte. It was of that high-back shape, with radiating and faded silk fronts, upon which elderly maiden mitten-wearing aunts were wont to play hymn-tunes as though they were studies in arpeggios! These upright—so very upright—instruments retained their popularity for more than forty years, when they were replaced by a more modern type of instrument—one that is known and heard by all men.

The interesting and informing catalogue of the Broadwood Exhibition—from which we have quoted in compiling the above chit-chat—contained some quaint extracts from a private housekeeping-book of Barbara Broadwood, a daughter of old Schudi. This curious relic of bygone times dates from the year 1769; its contents are of the most promiscuous nature—housekeeping accounts, memoranda concerning the business in its early years, &c. One entry reads: '8 lbs. of pork at 5*d*. a lb.'; another, '5 lbs. of veal at 5*d*. a lb.'—authentic records of prices current at that time. On January 9, 1773, Mrs. Broadwood notes that 'Mary Ann Patrix came into my service: agreed £7 wages and to find herself tea.' The cup that cheers but not inebriates was an expensive item of housekeeping in those days, as there is an entry of '½ lb. of tea at 12*s*. and ½ lb. of tea at 10*s*.' A wax doll cost 2*s*. 6*d*.; a pair of shoes, 3*s*. 8*d*.; and 'a silk petecoate, £1 3*s*. 0*d*.' Barbara Broadwood's marketings contain some quaint spellings, e.g., 'potetys, ryce, oyle, sellet, milke, grins, fishe, mengling, sellery, catshep, and musterd.' Sugar occasionally appears as 'shougger'; there can be no doubt about 'gusberys,' and 'coukumber' can hardly be improved upon.

Mrs. Barbara Broadwood little thought that the entries in her private memorandum book would get into print 135 years after she had noted them down as an everyday occurrence; nor could her famous husband—honest John Broadwood, of Cockburnspath, on the Berwickshire coast—have imagined that his business would attain to its present world-wide celebrity. Long may it continue to flourish!

FRANZ VON VECSEY.

Feelings of intense wonderment took possession of those who, spellbound in amazement, have listened during the past month to Franz von Vecsey, one of the most marvellous of child violinists. A child violinist he certainly is in years,—he has just turned eleven—but in technical skill, tone, and deep artistic feeling he has a rare combination of gifts that very few mature artists possess. Moreover his playing, most astonishing indeed in a child, is so certain, so natural, so pleasure-giving that, having heard not a few of the greatest violinists of the last half-century, we can only describe it as miraculous. No wonder that Dr. Joachim wrote in the boy's album 'God guard thee, thou wonderfully gifted child.'

Franz von Vecsey—the son of well-to-do parents, themselves gifted amateur musicians, the father an excellent violinist, the mother a skilful pianist—was born at Buda-Pesth in March, 1893. At the age of four he gave proof of his remarkable musical organization by humming the greater part of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by his father, and marking the rhythm by knocking together two flat pieces of wood.

He received his first lessons from his father. Not only did he easily master the technicalities of the instrument, but he remembered and played from memory any pieces put before him by his father, after having read them through with even greater facility than most children would read a book. At the age of seven, he was only permitted, for the sake of his health, to practise fifteen minutes daily, the same length of time being devoted to a violin lesson. He soon played Dancla's Studies, and added Paganini to his repertoire—all this before he was eight years old! He then became a pupil of Hubay, the distinguished professor at the Buda-Pesth Conservatorium. When rehearsing Paganini's 'Hexentanz' for the public examination, the boy, to his great grief, dropped his small instrument on the floor, which rendered it temporarily useless. Nothing daunted he rushed to his father and borrowed his full-sized violin and, without the least premeditation, he played upon it the 'Hexentanz' and a Wieniawski concerto to the delight of a critical audience. His parents thereupon decided to allow him to appear in public, with what success his marvellous performances in London bear incontestable testimony. (For the foregoing biographical particulars we are indebted to the Strad of February last.)

Franz von Vecsey—whose portrait, by the kindness of his agent, M. Schulz-Curtius, we are enabled to give—made his first appearance in England at St. James's Hall on May 3, when his programme included Wieniawski's Concerto in D minor, an Air by Bach, Hubay's Fantasia on Bizet's 'Carmen,' and Paganini's 'Hexentanz.' At the second concert, on May 10, he played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with extraordinary brilliancy, certainty, and true artistic insight. Crowded and enraptured audiences attended both these recitals, and also that given on May 17, when wonderment was increased rather than lessened by the boy's extraordinary performances. On these occasions the fascinating little fiddler was ably accompanied on the pianoforte by Herr Alfred Schmidt-Badekow, who also contributed some solos with acceptance. Finally, we may close with the words of Dr. Joachim, a fellow-Hungarian artist of little Franz: 'I am seventy-two years of age, yet never in my life have I heard the like; never believed it were possible.'

THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY EXHIBITION.

A veritable embarras de richesses will assuredly characterize the approaching Exhibition organized by the Worshipful Company of Musicians. Through the courtesy of the Committee we are enabled to place before our readers an epitome of the interesting and unique treasures kindly lent for the purposes of the Exhibition, and soon to be placed on view at Fishmongers' Hall.

His Majesty the King has graciously consented to lend the autograph score of the 'Messiah'; and Earl Howe has promised to allow his famous Hudson portrait of Handel to leave its home at Gopsall, and also to lend the letters written by the composer to Charles Jennens, the Earl's ancestor and the compiler of the 'Messiah' libretto. Other Handelian relics will be the Will, &c., from Dr. Cummings's fine collection, and a MS. book of compositions preserved in the library of the Duke of Chandos. From the Lambeth Palace library will come the MS. of a hymn in two-part harmony written about A.D. 1300, and a volume containing a musical puzzle by Dunstable, hitherto unsolved. The Virginal Book of Lady Nevill (lent by the Marquess of Abergavenny), a manuscript book containing compositions by Anne Cromwell, first cousin of the Protector; some leaves from an English Graduale, c. 1430; the Old Hall MS., c. 1450; a book of Lute tablature, c. 1650; and the original text of 'Tristan,' in Wagner's own handwriting, will all be of special interest. The large collection of music autographs will include the 'Comus' of Lawes; some Purcell compositions (from the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace); a fine, early autograph of Handel; the Andante of Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony; Mozart's Pianoforte-duet sonatas (Köchel, 497); Sketches for the String Quartet in C minor and Mass in D, and the complete MS. of Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 79 (Beethoven); Mendelssohn's Songs without words (Book 1), and the pianoforte score of 'Elijah'; and Sullivan's first song, in addition to specimens of Gluck, Scarlatti, Schubert, Spohr, Dussek, Liszt, Verdi, Gounod, and others. There will be letters galore, including one written by Beethoven to Schuppanzigh the violinist, whom he nicknamed 'Sir John Falstaff'; one of Dvorák's (in English) wherein he refers to himself as 'a man whose heart sticks to all what is English'; the last letter written by Liszt to Walter Bache, and communications penned by the Mozarts (father and son), Haydn, Weber, Verdi, Boito, and others.

The exhibition will be rich in portraits, some of which are coming from the Music School collection, Oxford. Every known portrait of Beethoven is to be shown, with notes as to their origin, &c. The collection of instruments will be both interesting and varied. The rich and curious stores of the Rev. Mr. Galpin and Mr. T. W. Taphouse are being drawn upon; and we shall see the Virginals that were formerly in the possession of Nell Gwyn and Queen Elizabeth respectively; also a Bird organ that belonged to George III.; the Lamont harp, and the harp of Mary Queen of Scots; the Chester recorders; a bass-drum from the field of Waterloo; a magnificent Ruckers harpsichord, lent by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; a sixteenth-century instrument showing the evolution of the violin; an Amati violin made for Charles IX.; and numerous other specimens of the violin family. The collection of medals of musicians will number over 500 specimens. The large number of printed books on music will be no less rare than fascinating; in this department the Royal College of Music has lent some of its treasures, and Mr. James E. Matthew—the owner of the largest of private musical libraries—has placed his complete and valuable collection entirely at the disposal of the Committee. Furthermore, in proof that the 'lighter side' has not been neglected, we may make mention of a pipe presented to Paganini, and the uncanny fiddler's snuff-box!

The exhibition, which is to be opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales on Monday, June 27, will remain open for about three weeks. It will be well worth several visits.

Church and Organ Music.

THE HYMN-TUNE 'MOSCOW' OR 'TRINITY.'

The familiar strain known as 'Moscow' has not only found its way into the hymnals of all denominations, but it is still sung in countless churches. Therefore a few words concerning its first appearance, its composer, &c., may not be without acceptance. The tune first appeared in an oblong folio publication entitled:—

A COLLECTION of PSALM and HYMN TUNES. Never Published before.

To be had at the Lock Hospital, near Hyde Park Corner.

N.B.—This Collection is Published for the Benefit of the Charity.

This book, known as 'The Lock Collection' and published in 1769, was edited by the Rev. Martin Madan (1726-1790), the author of 'Thelyphthora' and a very accomplished man, who held the honorary chaplaincy of the Lock Hospital. Here is the original form of the tune:—

A HYMN TO THE TRINITY.

Set by F. G.

Come thou Al-migh-ty King, Help us thy Name to sing.

Help us to Praise! Fa-ther All glo-ri-ous, O'er All Victor-i-ous! Come, and reign o-ver us, An-tient of Days.

Tasto solo.

It will be observed that the tune has not escaped the inevitable tinkering propensities of editors, who have not only changed the original form of the melody,

THE MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED IN THE YEAR 1844.

THE MUSICAL TIMES is the oldest English journal devoted to music and musicians; moreover, its existence has exceeded that of any other musical journal issued, or that has ever been issued, in this country. Started in June, 1844, it first appeared in the form of a modest sheet of eight pages; but in the intervening sixty years it has, like Topsy, "grewed" to about seventy pages every month.

Quantity, however, is not the summum bonum of a musical journal—quality should occupy the first place. If the quality test can be put to the proof by mentioning the names of contributors, THE MUSICAL TIMES has no reason to fear the result. The following have been some of the writers during recent years:

C. A. Barry, Joseph Bennett, Vernon Blackburn, Rev. Francis L. Cohen, Frederick Corder, Henry Coward, F. H. Cowen, W. H. Cummings, W. H. Hadow, Edward Heron-Allen, A. J. Hipkins, Arthur Johnstone, A. Kalisch, H. E. Krehbiel, Robin Legge, Otto Lessmann, Charles Maclean, J. A. Fuller Maitland, W. G. McNaught, E. Mandyczewski, F. Niecks, Ebenezer Prout, W. Barclay Squire, J. S. Shedlock, J. F. R. Stainer, Franklin Taylor, Herbert Thompson and F. Gilbert Webb.

Biography has been made a special feature during the past seven years. Upwards of sixty Biographical Sketches, with special supplement portraits, have appeared since July, 1897. These articles have been received with much favour both at home and abroad, and in Britain beyond the seas. English and foreign musicians of eminence, contemporary and bygone, have been included in this large gallery of MUSICAL TIMES Biographical Sketches: the subjoined list of names speaks for itself.

Illustrations have become an important and almost indispensable adjunct of present-day periodicals. This much-appreciated feature has of late been considerably developed in the pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES. A series of articles on English Cathedrals and College Chapels has furnished scope for the pictorial embellishment of the descriptive matter relating to these interesting subjects. This illustrated series will be continued, and also the articles on important musical libraries, public and private.

The survey under the heading Church and Organ Music has been greatly extended. The aim has been to provide matter that shall be both interesting and of practical helpfulness to those who officiate in "Quires and places where they sing."

The old-established characteristics of THE MUSICAL TIMES have been brought up to date. The "Occasional Notes," or leaderettes—as they are sometimes fancifully termed—cover a wide range of subjects. The monthly letters of such distinguished writers as Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of New York, and Dr. Eusebius Mandyczewski, of Vienna, need no commendation; and the periodical records of music-makings in various centres of musical activity are supplied by the leading writers on music in the Provinces. In the "Answers to Correspondents" section, no pains are spared in furnishing satisfactory replies to the questions asked, even though the interrogations be, as they often are, posers.

Reference may be made to the music—anthems or part-songs—appearing month by month, and to other well-known features of this old-established journal. THE MUSICAL TIMES has a large circle of friends and well-wishers in various parts of the world; and the many gratifying tokens of appreciation that are constantly being received, not only by letter but by frequent quotation in the Press, act as a stimulus to the Editor to increase the brightness of its pages and to make the paper more acceptable in the future even than in the past.

but have taken upon themselves to harmonize the unison phrase which gives so much character to the tune. One wonders whether the shakes were sung in the old days, and whether a congregation executed with unerring precision the syncopation in bar 2; of course it must be remembered that the pace of psalmody was much slower then than now; in fact, in some churches nowadays a tune like 'Moscow' is turned into a sort of scherzo, so breathless is the speed at which it is often taken.

The initials 'F. G.' at the head of the tune stand for Felice Giardini, an eminent violinist born at Turin, April 12, 1716. He began his musical career as a chorister at Milan Cathedral, where he studied singing, clavier, and harmony under Paladini. On his return to Turin he studied the violin under Somis, and when still very young he played in the opera band at Rome and subsequently at San Carlo, Naples. His brilliant execution became a snare to him, as he appears to have been fond of displaying it by ornamenting the accompaniments of songs with all sorts of runs, shakes, and cadenzas, feats of skill which elicited abundant applause. He was however cured of these inartistic propensities by Jomelli. During a performance of one of his (Jomelli's) operas the composer seated himself close to young Giardini. The introduction of a brilliant violin cadenza of great length into the ritornel of a pathetic air so exasperated Jomelli that, at the end of the display, he rewarded the offending young fiddler with a sound box on the ear! In after years Giardini liked to relate this incident, adding that he never had a better lesson in his life.

Leaving Naples, Giardini started for a tour in Germany, and made his way to London. Burney states that he first appeared here in 1750, at all events his success was unmistakable. 'His powerful yet mellow tone, the brilliancy of his execution, the spirited and expressive style in which he played the works of Tartini, as well as his own lighter but pleasing compositions, created a perfect furore, and he became at once the accepted favourite of the London public.' In 1752, when he became leader of the Italian Opera band in London, he infused new life and spirit into that organization. He suffered great losses as manager of the Italian Opera, and afterwards returned to a sphere of work for which he was more naturally fitted—playing and teaching the violin. He led the orchestra at various concerts in London and at musical festivals in the country. In 1784 he left England, resolved to retire from the active duties of his profession and spend the rest of his life in Italy. But his restless spirit brought him back again to London where, in 1790, he started comic opera at the Haymarket. This venture proved a failure. The old man then took his troupe to Russia, and died at Moscow, December 17, 1796, aged eighty.

Giardini was a prolific composer, as the long list of his works in Eitner's Lexicon bears full testimony. The catalogue embraces operas, a quantity of violin music, quartets, concertos, sonatas, &c. He is said to have composed an oratorio of 'Ruth.' This is only partly true, as its 'Act 1' was the handiwork of Avison, 'Acts 2 and 3' being by Giardini. The oratorio was first performed on February 13, 1765, at the Lock Hospital Chapel, near Hyde Park Corner; repetition performances took place in 1772 and 1787.

As to who first changed the name of Giardini's tune from 'Trinity' to 'Moscow'—an alteration doubtless in the nature of a compliment to its composer's death-place—we have been unable to discover with certainty. Its earliest adoption—so far as limited opportunities for research have permitted—seems to have been by Mercer in his 'Church Psalter and Hymn Book' (1855); but we shall be glad to know of a previous instance. The late Dr. Henry Allon, in his 'Congregational Psalmist' (1861), retained the original name 'Trinity.' By-the-way, this particular tune has been variously named: 'Bentinck,' 'Fairford,' 'Florence,' 'Hermon,' 'Italian Hymn,' 'Moscow,' and 'Trinity.' It is amusing to find that Canon Havergal, in his 'Psalmody' (published posthumously in 1871) stated that it is wrongly called 'Trinity,' considering that this is practically its baptismal name! But the ways of hymnal editors are more or less mysterious.

THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

The 250th anniversary of this time-honoured charity is being celebrated this year. Exceedingly appropriate therefore is the issue by Mr. John Murray of a history of the benefaction, entitled 'The Sons of the Clergy, 1655-1904,' by the Rev. E. H. Pearce, of the Court of Assistants and the Committee of the Festival. Music has always been an important feature of the annual Festival service, first held in 1655, and bearing an unbroken record since the year 1674. For 207 years—1697 to the present time—the service has taken place in St. Paul's Cathedral. In his notes on the music sung on these occasions, Mr. Pearce says, 'probably the first love of the Anniversary was Purcell's Te Deum and Jubilate, for voices and instruments, performed before the Sons of the Clergy at the Cathedral-Church of St. Paul.' In course of time Purcell was elbowed out by Handel, and of course there have been many changes since. The Festival Service of 1851 (in May), when London was full of visitors to the Great Exhibition, called forth a scathing notice in The Times, written by Mr. Davison—not 'Davidson,' as Mr. Pearce has it. The notice reads:—

We must, therefore, in spite of the regret it causes us, unequivocally condemn the music and the performance of the music which celebrated the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy yesterday afternoon. The choirs . . . cannot be brought to learn anything out of the common track; and thus Dr. Hayes is allowed to praise God in our cathedrals, while Mendelssohn is condemned to silence, although the one was a nonentity and the other a lofty genius. . . . For the meeting of the choirs yesterday there was, we understand, one rehearsal only. How, then, could an efficient execution be expected? Under such circumstances . . . Mr. Goss showed wisdom in adhering to the tattered conventionalities of Attwood and Dr. Hayes. Dr. Elvey beat time strenuously from the organ loft, but to very little purpose. He followed Mr. Goss, but the respective choirs went each its own way.

For the last thirty years the Festival has been a noble pæan of praise, thanks to the late Sir John Stainer and his successor, Sir George Martin. By-the-way, the author of this 'history' omits to mention that for about thirty years preceding 1873 orchestral accompaniments at the Festival were tabooed at the instigation of the Bishop of London (Blomfield)—a prelate who, in 1829, forbade an organ performance announced to be given by S. Wesley, T. Adams, and G. Cooper (the elder) at St. Sepulchre's Church, Holborn, for a charitable purpose.

We must not omit to state that Mr. Pearce's 300 pages give much interesting information concerning the history, management, officers, benefactions, banquets, festivals, &c., connected with the benevolent Society concerning which he writes. As is not unusual in a book about the clergy there are several humorous passages, as for example under the heading 'the choice of texts' at the Festival services—one eminent divine actually discoursed on the words to be found in Lamentations iv., 5—'They that were brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills'! No doubt the preacher thought this was a good way of embracing the opportunity.

The Festival of 1904 took place, as usual, in St. Paul's Cathedral on May 2, the Prince of Wales, who had consented to head the list of Stewards, being present with the Princess. There was a full orchestra and chorus. Sullivan's In Memoriam Overture served as the opening voluntary, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Barnby in E flat, and the anthem, specially composed for the occasion, was a setting of 'When the Lord turned again the captivity of Sion.' This anthem, composed by Dr. Eaton Fanning, who conducted its performance, made an excellent impression upon both singers and hearers. Sir George Martin conducted the rest of the service, and Mr. Charles Macpherson presided at the organ. The Bishop of Ripon preached to an enormous congregation, 'and the Old Hundredth' was sung at the end of the service.

'THE APOSTLES' IN YORK MINSTER.

The first performance of Dr. Elgar's 'The Apostles' in a cathedral—the true home of the oratorio—is announced to take place in York Minster on June 29, St. Peter's day, the patronal festival of the Minster. The chorus is to consist of the Leeds Choral Union, the orchestra will be from London, and soloists of first rank, including Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, are engaged. Mr. Alfred Benton will conduct, and the organ will be in the safe hands of Mr. T. Tertius Noble, organist of the Minster. We understand that the entire expense of the performance is being borne by a lover of music in Yorkshire who wishes to be nameless; but none the less is he to be highly commended for this most generous act. Admission to the Service will be free.

CATHEDRAL NEWS.

ST. PAUL'S.

A special service was held in the Metropolitan Cathedral on May 5, 'in commemoration of the consecration of Mellitus as Bishop of London by St. Augustine in A.D. 604.' The music sung on that imposing occasion included Stainer's Magnificat in A, Bach's 'The Lamb that was slain,' and Sir George Martin's effective Te Deum composed for Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee.

ELY.

Haydn's 'Creation' was sung in the Cathedral, under the Octagon, on May 3 by the Cathedral choir and the Choral Society, with assistance from Cambridge and other places, to the accompaniment of a full band. The soloists were Miss Evans, from the Royal College of Music, Mr. Reade, of Trinity College Choir, Cambridge, and Mr. Dearth, of Westminster Abbey. Dr. Wilson, organist of the Cathedral, conducted the performance.

WINCHESTER.

On the octave of Ascension Day (May 19) an orchestral service at Winchester Cathedral included the performance of the following music:—Stanford's Magnificat in B flat, Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' and a selection from the 'Messiah,' in addition to an Overture in C composed by Mr. W. Prendergast, organist of the Cathedral, who conducted the service. Dr. Sweeting was at the organ. 'A Brief Report to the Dean and Chapter of Music in Winchester Cathedral, Advent, 1902—Advent, 1903,' compiled by the Precentor (the Rev. Walter Slater), has recently been published. The compilation is after the model of those valuable and interesting records formerly issued by the Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral.

BRISTOL.

The organ in this Cathedral—can it be possible that it is still a G organ?—is to be improved and enlarged at a total cost of £3,500, of which £500 is already in hand. The work has been entrusted to Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons, who rebuilt the York Minster organ and who are about to reconstruct the instrument in Rochester Cathedral, therefore good results in both instances may be expected. In an appeal signed on behalf of the Organ Restoration Committee by the Dean, it is hoped 'that the people of Bristol, as well as of the Diocese at large, who have helped so generously in the past, will complete the work by providing an instrument worthy both of the mother-church of the Diocese and of the city.' Such an appeal will surely not be in vain. Donations may be sent to the Dean, or to the Secretaries of the Fund—the Rev. Vernon Holt, The Cathedral, and Miss Pigou, the Deanery, Bristol.

DURHAM.

Professor Dr. Armes, organist of Durham Cathedral, was presented (on April 30) by some of his old pupils with the full-dress gown of a Doctor of Music, a selection of books, and an album; and, at the same time, Mrs. Armes was the recipient from the same generous donors of a 'Georgian' tea-pot. Dr. Hutchinson made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers, and Dr. Armes replied in grateful and felicitous terms.

Benedict's 'St. Peter' was performed at Brixton Church on Sunday afternoon, May 1, by the Brixton Oratorio Choir accompanied by a full professional orchestra. Mr. Douglas Redman, organist of the church, conducted, and Mr. Welton Hickin discharged the duties of organist. This was the last service of the season of these successful oratorio performances.

Mr. Arthur Pearson, President of the Huddersfield and District Organists' Association, recently read a paper on 'The use of the Organ in Divine Service.' This Association, started in November last, is founded on lines similar to that of Wakefield. Mr. Fred. Clarkson, 35, Prospect Street, Huddersfield, is the corresponding secretary.

A stained-glass window, placed in the north aisle of St. Mark's Church, Tunbridge Wells, by public subscription, to the memory of the late Mr. N. E. Irons, was recently dedicated by the Bishop of Chichester. The inscription reads thus:—

To the memory of Nelson Elvey Irons, Born 1836, Died 1894, Organist of this Church 1867-1882.

LOWER RHENISH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

DR. ELGAR'S 'THE APOSTLES.'

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Cologne, May 22.

For the second time within two years an English composer has enjoyed the distinction of providing the chief novelty in the programme of a Lower Rhine Festival. When, in 1902, Dr. Edward Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was introduced to these historical Festivals by Professor Julius Butts, in Düsseldorf, I drew attention to the unique character of the honour done hereby to an English composer, and ventured to hint at the far-reaching results that might safely be expected to accrue from the great and immediate success which our composer's beautiful work achieved before a severely critical audience. Those results were not long in showing themselves. A gratifying revival of interest in the 'Dream' in England, and a most welcome, new-born and wholly beneficial spirit of emulation amongst English Choral Societies were the first-fruits of that 'famous victory' in the Rhineland. And now I find myself in 'holy Cologne' of ancient fame, and while the big bells of the glorious Cathedral ring in the joyous Whitsuntide, I bestir myself to give your readers some details of the second chapter in the remarkable tale of the results due to Professor Butts's daring step two years ago.

This evening the eighty-first Festival of the Lower Rhine commences with Dr. Elgar's 'The Apostles,' and to judge from two complete rehearsals which I have been privileged to hear, the work will be given an exceedingly fine performance. The Festival is under the direction of the municipal Kapellmeister, Generalmusikdirektor Fritz Steinbach, of Meiningen Orchestra fame, whose enthusiasm over the English novelty it is gratifying to hear. 'Es ist mir eine wahre Wohlthat gewesen, das Werk einzustudieren' (it has been a downright boon to me to rehearse this work), he remarked after last night's final rehearsal. 'There is something about it,' he continued—'you know, here!' (slapping his broad chest in the region of the heart).

The Festival programme contains only this one absolute novelty, i.e., in Germany. But Dr. Richard Strauss's choral ballad 'Taillefer'; Ernst von Wildenbruch's 'Hexenlied' for declamation, with orchestral accompaniment by Max Schillings; Max Bruch's Sanctus for double chorus, two solo sopranos and orchestra (from Op. 35); and the original version of 'Lohengrin's Erzählung' (containing twenty-four lines which Wagner ultimately discarded), will be novelties to me and doubtless to the majority of the audience.

May 23.

All doubts regarding the fate of Dr. Elgar's great work in Cologne were dispelled last night. The performance was superb in almost every detail, and the reception enthusiastic. The composer, who had come from England at the invitation of the committee, was called even after the first part, and warmly applauded, a rare distinction at these Festivals—so I was told. At the conclusion, after the audience had come under the spell of the stupendous 'Ascension' Finale, the enthusiasm of the crowded and brilliant house broke forth with unmistakable spontaneity. Amidst reiterated calls for 'Elgar' and 'Componist,' Herr Steinbach led the composer to the platform, where he was received with ringing 'Bravos' and tumultuous applause in which audience—consisting largely of musicians from all parts of Germany, Holland, and Belgium—and performers heartily joined.

Of the performance I can but repeat in the most emphatic manner that, a few trifling mishaps excepted, it was superb, and that Herr Steinbach proved himself a great conductor by the way in which, without any sort of hint from Dr. Elgar, he managed to realize the composer's intention; the orchestra playing was a pure delight from the opening note to the last, and the true value of the orchestration and its tremendous importance as a great factor in the composer's scheme were fully appreciated. Every point was clearly brought out, and I heard beauties and effects which I have never heard before. It simply showed once more what an enormous advantage a conductor of a municipal subsidized German orchestra with unlimited chances for rehearsing has over his colleagues in England. Herr Steinbach's orchestra was a revelation. What Sheffield did for the choral portions Professor Prout discoursed in his usual erudite manner on Bach's Partitas at the monthly meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians (London Section) held on May 14, at 20, Hanover Square.

Mr. Alfred Hollins, accompanied by Mrs. Hollins, sailed in the Ortona on May 20 for Australasia. Mr. Hollins will give recitals at Sydney, under the auspices of the Corporation, and elsewhere; he will be absent about six months.

of 'Gerontius' in London the other day, that Cologne has done for the orchestral score of 'The Apostles.'

The chorus sang with sureness, beauty of tone, and depth of expression. They produced, with the huge orchestra, the most astounding climaxes, the like of which I have never heard in a long experience. No wonder the composer was delighted therewith. The soloists were Frau Rösche-Endorf (Angel and Mary), Frau Metzger-Froitzheim (Mary Magdalene); Herren Dr. Felix von Kraus (Jesus), Heinrich Knoté (John), Theodor Bertram (Peter), and J. M. Orelío (Judas). Of these excellent artists the last-named gave the most convincing reading of any of the parts. Herr Orelío is an operatic singer, and his training stood him in good stead in interpreting the most dramatic part in the oratorio, while the two ladies sang with feeling and conviction. Herr Knoté's trumpet tones rang through the ensemble pieces in splendid fashion, and Herr Bertram was a safe and sturdy Peter, and the sincerity of Herr von Kraus in the part assigned to Jesus was at all times evident. Special mention must be made of the highly-artistic playing of the important organ part by Professor F. W. Franke.

After this unique performance I repeat once more what I have already, on two occasions, stated as my conviction, viz., that 'The Apostles' is a great work.

The Musical Competition Festival Movement.

FORMATION OF AN ASSOCIATION.

A well-attended and influential meeting, convened with the object of forming a Musical Competition Festival Association, was held at the residence of the Dowager Lady Beauchamp, 13, Belgrave Square, on May 17. Lady Mary Lygon, who presided, expressed her hearty sympathy with the objects of the meeting, and promised her active co-operation. She then called upon Miss Wakefield, the convener of the meeting, who, in the course of a very able and interesting speech, said:—

I do not think it is the least necessary here for me to go into the question of whether Musical Competition Festivals are worth encouraging or not. I think that every one attending this meeting has more or less experienced that, for those who love music or who wish to see it form a definite and important item in the life of the people of England, there is no such thorough, rapid, and far-reaching way for it to do so as is provided by the general scheme and organization of these Competition Festivals. Their component parts are stimulus and hard work. They appeal to our weaknesses (quite a useful thing to utilize and realize) as well as to our strengths. Also it is to be remembered of them that the work of all those taught is voluntary and for the love of music. The aim is not to make professional musicians or professional choirs, though such may result, but to inculcate a true love of music, which many of us believe to be more easily and comprehensively acquired by a comparatively small amount of personal practical application, than by a very much larger amount of what might be called aural instruction. The Festivals are no new idea. From Eisteddfod and joust of Minnesinger and Meistersinger these trials of vocal strength have, in one way or another, at many different times held their own, but their modern development is on very different lines to those of ancient days. I would sum it up as less of combat and more of organized study. My experience, I am glad to say, in the past nineteen years, has brought me into connection with many of these Festivals, so that the Westmorland Festival is merely one of a most interesting whole in my mind.

So much for retrospect; and for the accepted position of the value of Competition Festivals, I will merely accentuate this by reading a letter I have received from Sir Hubert Parry on the subject:—

'I do indeed think these Competition Festivals are splendid things—quite among the most hopeful signs of the times in this country. There are hundreds of ways in which they do good: Showing people how really enjoyable good music is when you come to know it, in spite of all that is said to the contrary, and giving people something to work for and exercise their faculties upon, which are troubled and dulled sometimes in the country districts when without an incentive to activity; and giving them also opportunities to meet together and expand their experiences of men and things.'

Before turning to the actual object of this Association to-day, I could not miss this opportunity of calling your attention very briefly to the one point I claim to be original, and adopted in many modern Competition Festivals, and that is the work done by the choirs in the music not for competition. To balance competition, in my mind combination is absolutely necessary, and I do not believe the greatest power for instruction is reached by these Festivals until this combined work is arrived at. It is the co-operative system adapted to musical requirements. Works can be performed and knowledge of music gained, by separate instruction and massed results, which astonish even those who have had experience of years' standing. To all those who have not yet undertaken it, I commend music learnt not for competitive purposes as the highest attainment of the most useful competition lever; therein speaks the voice of a great art quite directly to its humblest votaries, calling them to serve it, without emulation, without rivalry, but simply as 'Music, sacred tongue of God.'

And now as to the Association, with a Competition Festival Congress as its special object, about which we meet to-day. It has appeared to me for some years past that all of us connected with and interested in this movement wanted some practical binding link, also something almost of the 'Inquiry Bureau' character, to which many questions that arise on different topics could be referred, and at which papers would be read, followed by wide discussion. It has been my privilege and pleasure in the past nineteen years to receive a fair quantity of letters with all sorts of queries, some of which I was able to answer; in other instances I knew of people who could give much better advice than I could on the particular point in question. So it often seemed to me, if we could focus all our experience and knowledge in a Congress once a year, we could then, if it is properly organized, get the very best authorities on special subjects, which would be an enormous help to all. There should also be ample room for discussion, so that anyone could bring up points of difficulty. And furthermore I would suggest that Dr. McNaught and myself, if appointed secretaries, should be at hand for some portion of the day in some room to try and make ourselves generally useful! The idea of this Association should be (as I see it) as wide as music itself; no stereotyped rules or methods which might cut out one Festival while admitting another could be entertained. Our common ground should be our work for music, our difficulties and our successes. I am glad to say we all have both.

Miss Wakefield then proceeded to throw out some practical suggestions in regard to the proposed Congress, and, in conclusion, said:—

So, ladies and gentlemen, I would suggest that this Association embraces both the practical and ideal side of music in connection with these Festivals. I believe, if you approve of it and endorse its existence, that it will be one more step in a work of education which I am quite sure has the power to riddle England through and through with music.

It should be borne in mind that Miss Wakefield, as the originator of the Westmorland Festival at Kendal, may be regarded as the chief promoter of the recent Competition movement in England—a movement which is rapidly undergoing great development in various parts of the country.

Dr. McNaught, who was unavoidably prevented from attending the meeting, sent the following letter:—

DEAR MISS WAKEFIELD,

May 16, 1904.

I much regret that I am unable to come to the meeting on the 17th. I am engaged to adjudicate at the Pontefract Competitions, which commence on that day.

Closely connected as I have been for many years with the Competition movement, I should very much like to be present at the birth of the new Association.

Your circular so very well describes the possible utilities of the Association that it is unnecessary for me to say more on this head.

I am just completing a round of about five weeks' constant adjudications, during which I reckon that I shall have faced about 10,000 competitors. Others, of course, have been similarly engaged elsewhere.

It is increasingly evident that the potentialities of the movement are great, in rousing dormant musical faculty and in discovering and giving due honour to excellent work accomplished. As a school of choir training the Competition scheme is unique. In no other way can a would-be choir trainer or conductor gain so many pointed object-lessons on what there is to do and how to do it.

Among the numerous incidental utilities of the movement not the least is that it may help to conserve the study of our fine heritage of part-music and that, as well, it may tempt choirs and conductors to widen their knowledge by the study of the most modern music.

From the social point of view the value of the movement can hardly be over-estimated. Many of your audience must have had experience—sometimes pathetic—of its utility in this direction. It is this aspect of the movement that should make us all very tolerant of musical shortcomings.

I hope your meeting will be a thoroughly useful one.

Believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

W. G. McNAUGHT.

Mr. Henry J. Wood then bore his testimony to 'the value of the Competition movement as a factor in combined choral life,' and Dr. Somervell moved, and the Hon. Everard Feilding (Brigg) seconded, the first resolution:—

That this meeting expresses its approval of the formation of an Association of Competition Festivals, having as its object a yearly Congress to be held in London, at which papers on subjects specially connected with these Festivals could be read by well-known authorities, and discussions held on all matters of interest or difficulty.

Mr. W. H. Leslie (Hunstanton) moved, and Miss Cecilia Hill (Slough) seconded, the following resolution:

That this meeting approves that payment of the sum of 1s. per head should constitute membership of the Association, which payment would entitle each member to a ticket for the Conference; and that the Executive consists of a President (to be suggested by the Committee); Chairman of Congress, Lady Mary Lygon; Hon. Secretaries (pro tem.), Miss Wakefield and Dr. W. G. McNaught; Treasurer, Mr. W. H. Leslie; Committee, all the Secretaries of the Competition Festivals or Festival representatives throughout England, with Chairman, Secretaries, and Treasurer above. To be elected annually.

These resolutions were carried unanimously.

A discussion on various important matters relating to musical Competitions then ensued, in which the following ladies and gentlemen took part, the subjects on which they spoke being placed after their names:—

The Hon. Mrs. Robert Spencer (Northampton), 'On Prizes'; Mr. E. Minshall, 'The Financial Difficulties of Starting a Festival'; Miss Craig Sellar (Petersfield), 'The Possibility of a Competition of "Best Choirs" from each Centre'; Mrs. Commeline (Windsor), 'What is the simplest organization for putting competitive centres on a solid public basis?'; Miss Mary Egerton (York), 'How to obtain Musical Instruction for Villages'; Mrs. Peake (Retford), 'What possibility is there of County Council teachers for village classes?'; Dr. Perrin (Canterbury), 'Is it better to cover a large area when starting a Competition Festival, or to confine such efforts to a small area round the place where the Festival will be held?'

Votes of thanks to the Dowager Lady Beauchamp for kindly lending the room for the meeting, coupled with Lady Mary Lygon's name for presiding, were proposed by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland and seconded by Mr. Gervase-Elwes.

Further particulars concerning the Association may be obtained from Miss Wakefield, Nutwood, Grange-over-Sands, Lancashire, or from Dr. McNaught, Annandale, Woodside Park, London, N.

NORTHAMPTON.

The competitions here have the advantage of the direct superintendence of the Hon. Mrs. Robert Spencer. This year the adult sections met on April 16 and the junior sections on April 23. On the first day there were about fifty entries in the various choral sections. Rushden, Kensley Park, and Earl's Barton (Baptist) sent first-rate choirs. Five bands, variously constituted, entered. On the whole the proceedings were lively and interesting. The junior competitions were also very successful; the entries were numerous, and the standard of the singing often high. Dr. McNaught and Mr. George Rathbone adjudicated.

CARLISLE.

The Carlisle Festival, the ninth of the series, was managed this year with more than usual enterprise. The proceedings were spread over three days, April 19, 20, and 21. The services of Lady Maud Warrender and Mr. Plunket Greene were secured for the concerts. A local band was supplemented by professional aid from Manchester. The combined performance of the choirs was therefore made important. The competitions displayed the usual features, school choir singing and adult choirs in many sections. There were no instrumental sections. The entries were fairly numerous, and often the standard of performance was excellent. Many of the school teachers and choir trainers of the district are highly skilful in dealing with technics of choral performance.

In the chief choral class the tests were 'Come, Pretty Wag,' any chorus from Handel's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' ('The dead shall live' was chosen), and a piece to be sung at sight. Eaglesfield, under Mr. Lowry, won the first place, and Stanwix, under the Rev. H. Dams, the second. At the final concert the whole of Handel's Ode was performed, and Mr. Plunket Greene sang two cycles of songs. Dr. McNaught conducted and adjudicated. Mr. Mercer, the acting organist of the Cathedral, was to have taken a prominent part in the Festival, but a sudden illness forced him to retire. The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Carlisle is the President of the Committee, Mr. Hubert Lowry the chairman, and Mr. D. Hodgson the Hon. Secretary. The admirable get-up of the programme calls for due acknowledgment. All the words of the music sung at competitions and concerts were given in full, as they always should be on these occasions.

MID-SOMERSET.

The Somerset Festival this year was held on April 20 and 21, at Frome, the new hall at Shepton Mallet not yet being ready. Mrs. Mansell, whose energy never seems to fail, had got together a large number of entries for competition, an adult concert choir and a children's choir. The standard of the performances generally was a great advance on previous efforts, especially in the children's classes. The three adjudicators, Dr. Somervell, Mr. Henry R. Bird, and Mr. George Rathbone, all expressed great satisfaction with what they heard. A new feature was the 'Folk-Song' competition, adjudicated upon by Mr. Kidson. The combined choirs very successfully sang Handel's 'Ode to St. Cecilia,' under the direction of Mrs. Mansell. A professional orchestra accompanied. The combined children's choirs, conducted by Mr. Rathbone, sang Cowen's 'Village Scenes' and 'The Wind' (Rathbone).

HEXHAM.

The Tyndale Competition is a new-comer in the field. It was held at Hexham, Northumberland, on April 23, all the proceedings being comprehended in one day. Mrs. J. H. Ridley, Mrs. Arthur Gibson, and Mrs. J. C. Straker are among the chief promoters of the scheme. There were numerous entries in both the junior and senior sections, and there were many evidences of natural capacity. There is every prospect of the scheme having a useful career. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

LINCOLNSHIRE, SPILSBY, BRIGG, AND GRIMSBY.

In the Lincolnshire district, Mrs. Massingberd, of Gunby Hall, promotes a series of competitions held at Spilby, and Mr. Gervase-Elwes and his wife, Lady Winifrede, assisted by the Hon. Everard Feilding, work on similar lines at Brigg. This year both events were held concurrently on April 25 and 26, and on the next day there was a united meeting at Grimsby. All three competitions produced many satisfactory results. In the chief choral class at Grimsby the test-pieces were 'O lovely May' (German) and the far from easy part-song 'Autumn' (Brahms). It says much for the standard of the singing that Mr. Carl Smethurst's Spring Church Choir gained the first place by first-rate performances of both pieces. The Gunby Choir, under Mrs. Massingberd, came second, and Scunthorpe third. The Rev. H. Dams adjudicated at Brigg and Grimsby, and Dr. McNaught at Spilby.

WHITBY.

The Eskdale Tournament of Song held its second competition in Whitby on April 26 and 27. Its operations extend over the wide moorlands in North-East Yorkshire. The dalesfolk have shown skill and musical knowledge but little suspected until the Misses Yeoman (Sleights) took the initiative about two years ago, calling to their assistance Mr. Henry Hallgate, of Whitby. This year there were 160 entries, an increase of 40 on last year. Encouraging musical aptitude was shown all round. The sight-singing of the juniors was excellent, several candidates winning full marks. Small places such as Pickering, Castleton, and Loftus furnished 120 chorallists, who gave a spirited rendering of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' aided by a complete band of 45 players, and by Miss Ethel Bird, London, and Mr. Tom Child, Leeds, soloists, under the conductorship of Mr. Tertius Noble, of York Minster, the adjudicator.

PETERSFIELD, HANTS.

The fourth Petersfield Festival was held on April 26, 27, and 28. Miss Craig Sellar is the leading spirit of the undertaking. She had the gratification of experiencing a remarkable success on the present occasion. The entries were numerous, and the concerts which are a special feature of the scheme were overwhelmingly attended. On the first day the children's competition culminated in a performance of 'The Enchanted Palace' (Somervell), conducted by Miss Sellar. On April 27 local choirs competed in several sections, Redhill, under the Rev. P. A. R. Marriott, was very successful. The concert programme included 'A Song of Praise' (Somervell), conducted by the composer. On the last day Havant gained a banner for madrigal singing. The final concert brought forward an interesting programme under the conductorship of Mr. Donald Tovey. Dr. Allen adjudicated some of the competitions. Beethoven's 'Choral Fantasia,' with Mr. Leonard Borwick as pianist, was a great success, and a performance of Bach's cantata 'Sleepers, wake' was also much appreciated. The orchestra consisted of local amateurs stiffened by some professionals. Mr. Henry R. Bird was the pianoforte accompanist.

MORECAMBE.

For some years past the concluding day of the Morecambe Festival—the Saturday devoted to open competitions—has been famous. Nowhere in the world probably can one witness a more imposing display of popular musical genius as an annual event. Just recently special efforts have been made to extend the peculiar animation of Saturday's proceedings backwards, so as at least to cover the Friday evening concert. This year for the second time a large Festival Choir with contingents from Blackpool, Hanley, Kendal, and Morecambe was brought together on Friday, April 29—an arrangement only rendered possible by the offer of free hospitality to those coming from a distance made by a large number of volunteers among the Morecambe townspeople. Each of the choirs named had prepared three works for the Friday evening concert, namely, Bach's double chorus, 'Now shall the Grace,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' and Elgar's choral ballad 'The Wraith of Odin.' In the combined performance they were supported by the Nelson Orchestra—one of those taking part in the Saturday competition—which by arrangement with the executive had prepared the instrumental parts of the three works mentioned. Dr. Elgar rehearsed and conducted the two last-named works, and Dr. McNaught the Bach Chorus. The singing of the combined choirs was throughout of a high quality, but the standard of the orchestral playing showed a marked falling-off from that of last year, probably in consequence of the more stringent regulations against professionalism. This was to some extent noticeable in all the orchestral music of the evening, but most of all in the 'Song of Destiny,' where the extended harmonies peculiar to the Brahmsian scheme of orchestration gave so much trouble to the amateur instrumentalists that the result was far from satisfactory. In Elgar's 'Wraith of Odin' they did considerably better, but were still scarcely equal to the occasion. Each of the four choirs gave examples of madrigal and part-song singing, and that part of the concert was altogether enjoyable. An extremely brilliant special feature was the playing of the Brodsky Quartet, to which the exceptionally good acoustic properties of the hall (Morecambe Winter Gardens) lent added lustre. The selections were Tchaikovsky's No. 1, with the celebrated Andante Cantabile, and Beethoven's Third 'Razoumovsky.' After the delivery of the adjudicators' awards the prizes were handed over by Mrs. Elgar to the winners. Earlier in the day a competition was held between the four choirs, the test-pieces being the three compositions mentioned, of which selected portions were sung. The totals for the three pieces brought Morecambe Madrigal Society to the top of the list, and Hanley Cauldon Vocal Society to the second place.

The experience of last year, when the business of the Saturday proved altogether too heavy, induced the Executive to make a new arrangement, by which two of the adjudicators dealt with secondary open classes in the pavilion of the Central Pier, while the other two heard the male-voice choirs—an exceptionally large class—in the Winter Gardens. This arrangement worked satisfactorily, and the undue pressure of last year was avoided. Fourteen male-voice choirs competed in the class which sang Elgar's two choruses with words from the Greek Anthology, 'Feasting I watch with westward-looking eye,' and 'It's oh! to be a wild wind.' On the morning's work—which narrowed down the issue to Habergham, Harrogate, Lancaster, Manchester, and Southport—the leading position was held by the Manchester Orpheus Glee Society; but they were less successful in the evening with a whimsical part-song by Kücken, and the first prize ultimately fell to Southport Vocal Union (conductor, Mr. J. C. Clarke). The Manchester singers lost pitch very seriously in the evening, but the general standard of the male-voice singing was, as usual at Morecambe, very high, so high indeed that the weakest of the competing choirs would probably have beaten any south country society. In a class for mixed-voiced choirs of not more than thirty-five voices that have not won a prize in the principal open competition since 1896, Keighley Albert Street Baptist Choir were the first-prize winners. Here the test-pieces were a madrigal by Weelkes and a part-song by Stanford, which were repeated by the winning choir at the evening concert. In the female-voice choir competition, with Jensen's 'Mountain Spirit' as test-piece, Hanley Cauldon Vocal Society were the winners. In the class for full orchestras ('Magic Flute' Overture) the Nelson Orchestra, conducted by Mr. C. Townsley, took the first place, and in the string orchestra competition (Nocturne by Dvorák) the prize money was divided between the three competing orchestras—Nelson, Colne, and Rochdale—who were considered equal by the adjudicators, and were massed together for an evening performance under Dr. Elgar.

The work of the Challenge Shield Class—the principal open choral competition—was too important to be divided, and was all taken in the Winter Gardens. There were twelve competing choirs: Accrington, Barrow, Blackpool, Colne, Hanley, Harrogate, Kendal, Nottingham, Salford, Saltaire, Southport, and Workington. In the preliminary test the pieces were a madrigal by Vecchi, 'Phillida, come tell to me,' and a part-song by Brahms called 'Memories.' The renderings considered best by the adjudicators were those given by Blackpool, Hanley, Nottingham, and Southport respectively, and at the evening concert those four in turn sang Parry's part-song 'There rolls the deep,' and Elgar's 'On the Alm' (from the 'Bavarian Highlands'), the last-named piece with accompaniment sketched on a pianoforte. The best aggregate of marks was obtained by Nottingham Tabernacle Temperance Choir, conducted by Mr. C. E. Riley, and to that choir therefore the principal trophy of the Festival was awarded amid a scene of tremendous enthusiasm.

This year's adjudicators were four in number. Dr. Elgar was again the presiding genius of the occasion, and Dr. McNaught the indispensable expert whose fine mastery of detail alone averts the confusion that often threatens amid the inevitable turmoil of a vast and excited assembly, notwithstanding the best of intentions and general behaviour that seems at Morecambe to be invariably good. Two famous choirmasters—Dr. Coward, of Sheffield, and Mr. Wilson, of Manchester—completed the bench, upon the constitution of which the Executive may be heartily congratulated.

The educational value of the Wednesday, which is the children's day, and of the Thursday, devoted to local competitions, is out of all proportion to the public interest of the proceedings. The work of those days was this year highly satisfactory for the most part, in respect both of the numbers that competed and the standard of talent and attainment exemplified. There were moreover features of special interest in the Thursday evening concert, such as the duet-singing of Misses Hilda Morris and Kate Howson and the part-songs given by the Morecambe Madrigal Society.

BRISTOL.

The fact that the competition scheme founded last year by Mr. W. E. Fowler is called an 'Eisteddfod' invites speculation as to whether this title differentiates the event from an ordinary competition. So far as we can judge it would appear that the inclusion of elocution is the only distinguishing feature. But however this may be, we can congratulate Mr. Fowler and his coadjutors on the success of their labours. This year's event took place in the Victoria Rooms on May 2, 3, and 4, and attracted numerous entries. Besides choral and solo singing sections there were numerous graded sections for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello playing. The adjudicators' board included Dr. McNaught (solo and choral), Mr. Tobias Matthey (pianoforte), Mr. Alfred Gibson (violin), Mr. Cuthbert Nunn, Mr. D. Rootham, Mr. Hubert W. Hunt (organist of Bristol Cathedral), and Mrs. Tobias Matthey (elocution). Many of the performances reached a high standard. Some of the competitors travelled long distances to take part. The Bristol Harmonic Male-Voice Choir won a first prize in their section, and the 'Sine Nomine' Choir, under Mr. R. E. Simmonds, gained the first prize in the chief mixed-voice choir section.

WORCESTER.

The Madresfield Competitions, founded by Lady Mary Lygon, were held this year at Worcester on May 3, 4, and 5. Usually the Festival is held at Malvern. It was hoped that on this occasion, the ninth of the series, Worcester amateurs would be drawn into the fold; but they held aloof, probably mainly because they did not quite grasp the educational aims of the scheme. The choral singing was often of a very high order. In the female voice choir section the choirs conducted respectively by Mr. Chignell, Mrs. Fitton, and Mr. Harvey were all first-rate. They were placed in the order named. In the chief mixed-voice class the Malvern Madrigal Society, under Mr. Cook, won by a fine performance of Elgar's 'Weary Wind.' There were sections for orchestras and brass bands. Two of each kind appeared and played extremely well. A section for 'any wind instrument' brought forward a cornet, a clarinet, and a trombone. In a folk-song class some quaint songs were performed by competitors. Mr. Walter Ford adjudicated in this section. Two concerts were given with full orchestra. At the first, Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' was admirably performed by the combined resources under the direction of Lady Mary Lygon. At the second Bach's 'Sleepers, wake' was performed. At both concerts one of the most popular items was the Lady Radnor Suite for Strings by Sir Hubert Parry. Other highly appreciated numbers in the programme were the performance of Handel's 'Fourth Organ Concerto in F' by Mr. G. S. Chignell, and the rendering by the combined choirs of Elgar's part-song.

BERKS, BUCKS, AND OXON.

The Festival which seeks to focus the competitive activity of these three counties was held this year at Oxford on May 5, 6, and 7. The programme was as comprehensive in its subjects as the district served is wide. There were choirs of all sorts and sizes, orchestras, string solos, chamber music, pianoforte, organ, and vocal solos, and a class for composition. The judges were Dr. Allen, Rev. E. H. Fellowes, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Beringer, Dr. Harwood, Dr. McNaught, Dr. Buck, Dr. Iliffe, Dr. Varley Roberts, and Mr. W. H. Hadow. There were a great number of entries, and even with three days and a large staff of judges it was difficult to get through the work in good time. The results were often of the highest class. Much interest was taken by the public. The proceedings culminated in a gathering of the adult choirs in the Town Hall on April 7. About 800 singers sang 'The Song of Miriam' (Schubert) and a selection of choral pieces, amongst which was a new madrigal, 'In Praise of Song,' specially composed for the Festival by Sir Hubert Parry, who conducted the concert, and also contributed a characteristically wise and humorous speech, in the course of which he dwelt on the advantages to be gained by the competition movement. The list of the council executive committee, local secretaries, patrons, and contributors to the expenses contains some hundreds of names. Miss Cecilia Hill and Mrs. Commeline are the organizing honorary secretaries.

NORTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, RETFORD.

Another centre for music competitions has now been established at Retford, which is intended to serve the northern part of Nottinghamshire. It was originated through the enterprise of Mrs. Herbert Peake, and, judging from the well-organized and enthusiastic meeting that took place on May 9 and 10, the institution promises to have a long career of usefulness before it. It followed what may be known as the 'Wakefield' lines, and had the advantage of the co-operation of two people experienced in the management of these competitions—Mr. F. S. Hatchard, who organized a similar one at Pontefract a year ago, and Dr. McNaught, who, as adjudicator, is peculiarly qualified to foster a competition in its infancy, since his method is distinctly encouraging, and even his most drastic criticisms are veiled by a genial smile that deprives them of all their bitterness.

Small beginnings characterize all these competitions, and though the Retford amateurs were not below the average that one might find in any rural district uncultivated by a course of competition, they showed ample room for the improvement which such an educational movement always brings, if persevered in long enough. There was a welcome feeling of enthusiasm and fairly good material upon which to work, but a very general lack of knowledge how to put it to the best use. The elements of voice production seemed unknown, and there was a general confidence in the light of nature which was not justified by the result. In this fallow field the adjudicator cast some valuable seed of instruction and advice, and in one matter, the production of vowel sounds so as to secure a good blend of choral tone, he gave a useful little object-lesson to a choir extemporized from the voices happening to be on the platform.

In the children's choirs there was a prevalence of stolid rhythms and mechanical interpretations which it is just the province of these competitions to improve. Teachers in elementary schools have often unpromising material to deal with; they have few standards by which to test their work, and small encouragement to accomplish anything very artistic. After hearing each other's performances, with their merits to be copied and faults to be avoided, and after listening to such helpful remarks as a competent and experienced judge can make, they should return to their labours with renewed zest, and, if one may judge by the results of other similar competitions, it may be fairly expected that an advance will be felt a year hence.

The adult choirs showed no less than the juvenile the necessity of some instruction. The intonation was frequently at fault, the tonal attack was uncertain, the quality was often rough—at least in the village choirs; but in some classes good as well as promising results were achieved. Especially was this the case in the choirs of male voices and female voices respectively, which furnished some highly creditable singing, and the choral societies also displayed excellent material and an enthusiasm that should, under favourable conditions, carry them far. Among the individual performers, a young lady violoncellist, Miss Dorothy Spencer, showed exceptional promise, and the average level of the adult violinists was very high. A concert concluded each day's proceedings, and the interest felt in the competitions was pleasingly evinced by the appearance of Lady Gertrude Foljambe and the Duchess of Portland to distribute the prizes.

The Duke of Portland made an excellent speech in supporting the scheme, to which we wish all success.

YORK.

The York competitions have been established for several years, and now pursue a way of such even tenour that minute criticism of the proceedings on May 10 and 11 is not necessary. On the first day the juvenile competitors and the instrumentalists were reviewed by Mr. Egerton Lowe, and on the second the senior choral competitions were adjudicated upon by Dr. McNaught. The great efficiency of the school choirs in this district was fully maintained. To one of the larger choirs the judge awarded full marks for its intelligent and expressive performance, nor was this an isolated instance. It is curious, and not easily explicable, that the children distinguished themselves especially by their careful enunciation, a point in which the seniors were so deficient that a prize to encourage this particular virtue went a-begging, since the adjudicator found himself unable to award it to any of the choirs that came forward. There were some good instrumental performances, both by children and adults, and the excellence of the playing at sight was a wholesome and welcome sign. In the senior choral classes there was on the whole an advance, especially in musicianship and beauty of tone; what seems most desirable in the future is a more careful study of the words, and, as has been mentioned, a greater endeavour to make them plain to the hearer. In pure musical beauty, the singing of Schumann's part-song 'The steadfast heavens' by a village choir would not be easy to surpass. A chorus from Brahms's 'German Requiem,' and another from Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion,' were among the choral tests. The latter was chosen from all the choruses in the cantata at the moment of the competition by the judge, an excellent plan, since it involved the preparation of the whole of the work, and avoided what is a rather objectionable feature in competitions, the expenditure of much time on polishing the details of a single piece, to the exclusion of study that tends to a general advance in musicianship. The performance of 'Lauda Sion,' under the conductorship of Miss Mary Egerton, the founder and president of the York competitions, and the appearance of the Duchess of Norfolk to distribute the prizes, are events that deserve record.

LONDON WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS.

The eminently useful annual competition took place at St. Andrew's Hall on April 14. The Marylebone Club (Mr. W. G. Rothery) gained the first place. Six clubs competed and also sang the Cantata 'Vogelweid' (Rathbone) under Mr. H. J. B. Dart.

PONTEFRAC.

Those who were interested in the establishment of these competitions a year ago, chiefly through the instrumentality of a local amateur, Mr. F. S. Hatchard, were no less interested in watching the result of a second meeting, when it would be possible to note the advance of the movement.

The competitions, which took place on May 17-19, showed an unmistakable advance in several ways. The children's choirs were particularly satisfactory in this respect, showing distinct improvement in refinement and musical feeling. The classes for solo vocalists seemed popular, attracting many entries, and producing some really excellent results, both in the village section and the open section. A contralto, Miss Alice Ruddlesden, who, in the latter class, sang Glück's 'Che farò,' showed a combination of natural and acquired gifts, together with a temperament that lent itself to the display of genuine emotional feeling, which are rare in any vocalist, and should, if carefully cultivated, carry her far. The number of juvenile soloists was also remarkable, and involved the employment of an assistant judge, Mr. R. B. Walker, a local musician, who in this way materially lightened the labours of Dr. McNaught, who resumed his position as chief adjudicator.

It was however much to be regretted that this interest in solo singing was at the expense of choral work, which it is of course far more the object of these competitions to encourage. In this section the entries were comparatively meagre, and in three of the most important classes there was but a single entry, and that of the same choir, whose enterprise may have served, as one would like to hope it did serve, to inspire others to do likewise a year hence. At any rate, steps are being taken to make the value of these competitions, as a means of educating the amateur musicians of the district, better understood, and it is much to be hoped that the result of any missionary propaganda undertaken may be made manifest when the competitions are renewed. Their popularity is already ensured; what is needed is to direct it into the most useful channels.

WENSLEYDALE.

The seventh 'Tournament of Song' took place at Leyburn on May 18 and 19 on similar lines to those adopted at former meetings. The judge was however a new one, Mr. C. H. Moody, the able organist of Ripon Cathedral. Children's competitions occupied the first day, and here it was satisfactory to notice the continued interest taken in instrumental music in this purely agricultural district. Though no very high standard was reached, it is certainly encouraging to find young people taking to orchestral instruments as well as to the pianoforte, for though we may not expect or wish them all to become orchestral players, their experience should give them a special interest in orchestral music that is so much to be desired in this country. In the senior competitions, taken on the second day, there were several more instrumentalists, who were not only heard as soloists, but took part in pianoforte trios and string quartets.

The village choirs that were heard in chants and anthems showed a right spirit, and sung with reverence, intelligence, and a feeling for the nature of their work. In the Choral Societies' classes there was some highly creditable singing, and the Bedale Society's reading of Macfarren's part-song 'Orpheus, with his lute' so pleased the judge that he awarded it full marks. An interesting innovation was a class for callow composers, who were invited to submit a hymn-tune and double chant of their own composition. Originality is not, of course, to be expected in such a competition for amateurs,—indeed, experience shows that it is not invariably attained by the most expert composers who attempt a type of composition that affords so little room for variety—but at any rate it serves to promote musicianship, which is no doubt all that is intended. The 'Tournament' ended with a performance of 'Elijah,' conducted by the Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett, who has done so much for music in the district as to deserve to be styled the missionary of the Dales.

THE FEIS CEOIL.

The Feis Ceoil was held in Dublin from May 16 to 21. Three concerts were given, at which the place of honour in the prize compositions must be given to Mr. Hamilton Harty's Symphony—a work of very great ability and one that displays a quite remarkable knowledge of orchestration. The composer, who conducted the work admirably, received quite an ovation at its conclusion. Signor Palmieri's Cantata 'The Exodus' (also conducted by its composer) is a melodious composition, and evidently the work of an experienced musician. At the same concert Dr. Charles Wood's 'Ode to the West Wind' was given, conducted by Mr. Robert O'Dwyer. The prize anthem by Carl Hardebeck, which was performed at the first concert, contains a baritone solo, admirably sung by Mr. J. C. Doyle.

The choral competitions were very good this year, and showed a distinct improvement both in quality and quantity. The following are the principal awards (first and second prizes), Dr. Sinclair, of Hereford, being the judge; the name of the conductor follows that of the choir:—

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

'PATRON'S FUND' CONCERT.

Reference has already been made in these columns (p. 306 of the May issue) to the sum of £20,000 presented last year by Mr. S. Ernest Palmer to the Council of the Royal College of Music, the income of which was to be devoted in various ways to the encouragement of British art.

The first-fruit of that generous gift was the orchestral concert given on May 20 at St. James's Hall. Composers may produce and even publish, but unless they have opportunities of hearing their works and hearing what is said about them it is discouraging for creative artists to persevere and properly develop their talent: as sunshine to a plant, so is a favourable reception or a kindly word given to a rising musician.

Of the forty-two compositions submitted to the committee of musical experts from the Royal College and Royal Academy of Music, fourteen were selected for trial rehearsals, and from this reduced number was made up the programme of the concert under notice. It included two overtures by Messrs. Henry Geehl and York Bowen—works showing not only technical skill but poetical feeling. 'Fantasie-variations on a Swedish air' by Mr. William V. Hurlstone and a Symphonic Poem by Mr. Frank Bridge are interesting and ambitious, but they would bear condensation. A Scena, 'Manfred's Soliloquy,' and another 'Grettir's Departure,' by Mr. A. von Ahn Carse and Mr. Paul Corder respectively, deserve favourable mention. A weird song, 'The Hag,' by Mr. Frank Bridge, and a light Suite by M. Gustav von Holst completed the programme.

All the works were conducted by their respective composers—with the exception of Mr. Corder's Scena and Mr. Hurlstone's Variations, of which Sir Charles V. Stanford took charge. There was a very large, attentive, and appreciative audience.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The season opened on May 2 with Mozart's 'Don Giovanni'; moreover it was the first of a cycle of special performances under the direction of Dr. Richter. This prominence given to Mozart's masterpiece is most welcome. 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' 'Rigoletto,' and a few other modern operas, especially when the cast includes distinguished vocalists, draw the public; apart from these, Wagner rules the stage. That his operas and music-dramas should prove such powerful magnets is natural enough, for are they not works of genius? Yet it is a pity that the public should become indifferent to the great masters who preceded Wagner—Mozart, Gluck, and Beethoven. Yet such is for the most part the case. Even the interesting performances of 'Don Giovanni' and 'Figaro' last month did not draw full houses; Gluck is never played now, and 'Fidelio' is absent from the Covent Garden scheme. The attempt then to honour Mozart is most praiseworthy, and it is to be hoped that the importance of this new undertaking of the Syndicate will be fully recognized.

As to the renderings of the two operas, it cannot be said that they were in all respects satisfactory. Although there were good interpreters and much deserving of praise, in neither representation was there that perfect understanding of and sympathy with the master's music that one could have wished. The orchestral playing under the direction of Dr. Richter was a special feature; there was no attempt to give a modern—or may we say Wagnerish?—reading of Mozart's score. The works were announced to be given without cuts; in the case of 'Don Giovanni' however this was not strictly observed. It may not be a matter of much moment, and certainly the omission, to name one thing, of the original finale of the opera was beneficial; but as Shylock desired his pound of flesh, so no doubt the announcement 'without cuts' caused amateurs to expect their full measure of music. In 'Don Giovanni' the three ladies were Fräulein Destinn, Madame Suzanne Adams, and Miss Alice Nielsen, while MM. Journet, Salignac and Renaud impersonated Leporello, Don Ottavio, and the Don respectively. In 'Figaro' Madame Suzanne Adams was the Countess, M. Journet the Count, and M. Seveilhac, Figaro.

'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and 'Tristan' were the three Wagner operas included in the special performances. Here the advisability of giving them in their entirety is open to discussion; it was most interesting so to hear them, but for ordinary occasions wise use of the pruning-knife is to be recommended, though certainly not to the extent to which we are accustomed. These performances were admirable; space however compels us merely to single out Fräulein Ternina, the incomparable Isolde; Fräulein Destinn, whose Elsa was in many ways commendable; Madame Kirkby Lunn; and Herr Herold, who has a remarkably fine voice, and Van Rooy merit special mention.

Apart from these cycle evenings, we must refer to the great and well-deserved success of Fräulein Destinn in 'Pagliacci' and to the truly excellent performance of 'Rigoletto' under Signor Mancinelli, with Madame Melba as Gilda, and Signor Caruso as the Duke.

THE MUTILATION OF A MASTERPIECE.

At the Musical Association, on May 10, Dr. W. H. Cummings read a paper in which he defined the responsibilities of an Editor of Music. In the past there were numerous instances where, either from want of knowledge or mistaken zeal, great injustice had been done. For instance, Purcell's Te Deum had been enlarged and added to by Dr. Boyce; on the other hand the same work had been reduced and mutilated by Stafford Smith. The special matter which the lecturer desired to bring before the meeting was the extraordinary copy of the 'Messiah' recently published as the work of the late Dr. Chrysander, who called it a 'conducting' copy, and put it forth as a model of the right mode of performing Handel's popular oratorio.

The lecturer read through the reprinted score page by page and showed that in the whole work only two movements were left as Handel composed them. Dr. Chrysander not only omitted whole movements, but emasculated almost every number, leaving out many bars not only of the arias, but also of the various fugal choruses, thus frequently deleting the most important working-out of the subjects. Moreover he disfigured the various solos by inserting incongruous ornamentation and cadences of his own composition; in order to introduce these latter he did not scruple to change the rhythms from quadruple to triple.

Dr. Cummings said a great wrong had been done to the art and to the reputation of a classic composer, and worse still, if the musicians of Germany accepted the version put forth by Dr. Chrysander as a true representation of the traditional manner of the performance of Handel's 'Messiah,' they would have reason to accept the opinion which had been entertained in Germany that Handel's music was antiquated and rococo.

Dr. Maclean was in the chair, and, with Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Mr. T. L. Southgate, took part in the discussion following the reading of the paper.

'THE KING'S PRIZE.'

A NEW OPERA.

The pupils of the London Music School produced at the Royalty Theatre, on April 29, an opera entitled 'The King's Prize,' founded on Scott's 'Quentin Durward' by 'S. R.,' and composed by Mr. Alick Maclean. Though suffering from the usual defects of pupils' performances,—defects chiefly due to the inexperience of the executants—the occasion served the excellent purpose of proving the young composer's unmistakable gift of writing effectively for the operatic stage. Mr. Maclean seems to have the requisite theatre blood in his veins. The libretto of 'The King's Prize' is laid out on somewhat old-fashioned lines, with ample opportunities for set numbers in the way of choruses, songs, duets, &c. In such movements, no less than in the orchestral accompaniments (suggestive of the modern Italian style) to the Dialogue, Mr. Maclean succeeds in interesting his audience by means of a fluent melodiousness, rhythmic variety and charm, and clever characterization. Several of the songs, and especially a duet 'Red, red is the rose,' pleased greatly and were deservedly applauded with genuine warmth. The choruses and tutti portions are bright and fanciful, and sonorously and effectively written for voices and orchestra; at times they show real dramatic grip, and rise to considerable heights of impressiveness, thus auguring well for such more recent operas as the composer may have in his portfolio.

Of the performers Mr. Arthur Durand, as Louis XI., stood head and shoulders above his colleagues, both as singer and actor. His excellent enunciation obviated the necessity of referring to the text-book, and he managed to impart character to both voice and gesture. Miss Ethel Windsor Locke sang charmingly a dainty song entrusted to a 'Herd-boy,' and Miss Daisy Campbell, Madame Blanche Newcombe, Messrs. Percy Bates, A. W. Fordham, R. Jecks, A. Kennedy, and Edwin Webster sang the remaining parts, the last-named giving dramatic significance to the part of Creveceur, and singing his solo with artistic effect. A somewhat general and trying tendency to sing beside the pitch may have been due to nervousness, while the occasional roughness of the orchestral playing must be put down to the pupils' inexperience. The stage-management was in the safe charge of Mr. Charles Fry, who did wonders under exacting circumstances. The chorus especially displayed an intelligent interest in the drama, and acted with a savoir faire worthy of grand opera. Mr. Henry Beauchamp conducted vigilantly and resourcefully. We may add that the composer of the opera is a son of Dr. Charles Maclean.

THE TONIC SOL-FA COLLEGE.

The annual meeting at Exeter Hall on May 9 was presided over by the Lord Chief Justice, who is well known as a distinguished musical amateur. In his speech Lord Alverstone said that he had made a hobby of choral singing for fifty years, and as an old member of the Madrigal Society he knew what a wealth of beautiful music existed in the writings of the old English composers of from 1550 to 1800. He had heard famous German choirs in that Hall and elsewhere, but nothing produced in the way of unaccompanied music by other countries compared with our madrigals and glees of the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries. He much regretted that so many choral societies neglected this kind of music. He considered that part-singing was one of the best sides of music possible to be enjoyed by old and young.

An interesting address on the introduction of the Tonic Sol-fa system into Hungary was given by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole.

A demonstration of sight-singing from both notations and of writing by ear was successfully given by a class of girls from the Kirkdale Road School, Leytonstone, and two part-songs were well sung by a 'commercial' choir of workers from a suburban printing works. A choir of 400 voices, conducted by Mr. L. C. Venables, rendered a selection of choral pieces. Mr. H. C. J. Churchill presided at the organ and opened the meeting with a short recital.

London and Suburban Concerts.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A delightfully finished interpretation of Mozart's Symphony in E flat opened the Philharmonic Concert on April 28 at Queen's Hall. There was a freshness and delicacy about the passages for the wood-wind that were truly delightful, and the joyous work has seldom had a more vivacious interpretation. The novelty of the evening was a Concertstück in A flat (Op. 11) for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Signor Franco da Venezia. This did not prove of great musical interest, but the brilliancy of the pianoforte part enabled Signor Ernesto Consolo to advantageously display his fine technique. A memorable performance was that of Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto in A minor (Op. 30), the solo part of which was rendered with exquisite tone and finish by M. Jean Gerardy. The vocalist was Miss Minnie Tracey, who sang the scena 'Le Reveil de Bruneilde' from M. Reyer's opera 'Sigurd,' performed at Covent Garden on July 15, 1884.

The concert on May 19 opened with Dr. Elgar's Overture 'In the South,' originally produced at the Festival held in honour of the composer at Covent Garden. Under Dr. Cowen's direction, and the more favourable acoustics of the Queen's Hall, the Overture became much more impressive. The increased virility of the opening section, and the force and grandeur of the march suggested by recollections of the old Roman Empire, were very marked, and the applause was so continuous, evidently in order to bring the composer on to the platform, that Mr. Berger had to come forward and state that Dr. Elgar was not present. Another notable performance was Glazounow's Symphony No. 6 in C minor, performed for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. This work also improves on further acquaintance, and its genial and attractive elements were most effectively set forth. M. Fritz Kreisler gave a remarkably finished and pure reading of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and a distinctive feature of his playing was his own cadenzas, that in the first movement being exceptionally fine. We need only add that the vocalist was Mr. Gregory Hast, who fully sustained his reputation as an accomplished singer. Dr. Cowen conducted both concerts with his usual artistic insight.

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.

The invitation concert given at St. James's Hall on May 10 possessed great musical interest owing to the performance of Handel's 'Jephtha.' So seldom is this oratorio heard that to concert-goers in general it comes almost as a novelty. The work had evidently been very carefully prepared by the Handel Society, the result being an excellent rendering; a good balance of tone was maintained throughout, and the choruses were attacked with confidence and precision. If the orchestral playing was not so satisfactory, the principal soloists—Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Francis Harford, and Miss Georgina Dupuis—sang with refinement and discretion. The other solo parts were efficiently rendered by Miss May Hawker, Miss Alles von Geldler, and Madame Le Mar. Mr. J. S. Liddle conducted, and Mr. E. G. Croager presided at a 'Positive' organ. Before the commencement of the oratorio the 'Dead March' in 'Saul' was played in memory of the late hon. treasurer of the Handel Society, Mr. Edward Price Pearce, who was also one of its original members.

THE LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

This enterprising Society, conducted by Mr. Arthur Fagge, is to be warmly commended for selecting Dr. Elgar's 'King Olaf' for its concert on April 25 at Queen's Hall, for is it not a work full of sterling music—music that is romantic and expressive? The special feature of the evening was the performance of five new part-songs for male voices, composed by Dr. Elgar. These interesting novelties are severally named 'Yea, cast me from heights,' 'Whether I find thee,' 'After many a dusty mile,' 'It's oh! to be a wild wind,' and 'Feasting I watch,' their texts being English translations of old Greek poetry. If the third of the set is the most elaborate, and the second and fourth are the most charming, all are highly original and show the hand of a master. The soloists in the cantata were Madame Clementine de Vere, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies. In recording this the final concert of the first season of the London Choral Society, we may congratulate Mr. Arthur Fagge and his coadjutors upon what they have already accomplished, and wish them increased success in the future.

MR. B. HOLLÄNDER'S ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

London is the richer by a new conductor and a new orchestra since May 11, when Mr. B. Holländer's Orchestral Society gave their first public concert at the Kensington Town Hall. We greet conductor and band with the warmest of welcomes, for they proved themselves worthy of being judged by a standard which only a few years ago would have seemed preposterously high for any 'mere suburban affair.' Mr. Holländer invited the severest criticism by a programme including such trifles as Beethoven's Third 'Leonore' Overture, Saint-Saëns's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto, and Brahms's C minor Symphony (No. 1), and we mean to apply such criticism when we state deliberately that the concert was artistic and enjoyable in a high degree. The band consists largely of ladies—at least in the string department; but there are no 'passengers' amongst them. They play standing up, even throughout the Symphony, which may partly account for the fire and energy with which they interpret the music put before them. They all seem experienced players, for their free and vigorous bowing has nothing of amateurish awkwardness about it. Moreover their tone is pure, full, and rich; in fact, here is at last a case of lady players meeting their male colleagues on equal terms—they literally 'face the music.' The wind and percussion instruments are in the hands of seasoned artists, and only the raucous exuberance of the brass and percussion was momentarily and unpleasantly reminiscent of other halls and other conductors.

Mr. Holländer directs his forces with dignity and authority; he wisely eschews the showman's antics in his gestures; yet his beat is both clear and graceful. He knows the classics thoroughly, so that he can dispense with the printed score of even a complex work like the Symphony of Brahms. He does not ruin the natural flow of the music by irritating point-making, and yet he gives readings aglow with colour and romantic fervour. His interpretation of the glorious Finale to Brahms's 'No. 1' was masterly, and scarcely inferior to that given last year by Herr Fritz Steinbach with the famous Meinigen Orchestra. The introductory Adagio to that Finale, Brahms's greatest epic effort, stood out as the crowning point of the concert, and revealed interpretative gifts of the highest order. Such grandeur and dramatic intensity, such dignity and pathos are only read into the 'dead letters' of a printed score by a master conductor. After this we expect great things from Mr. Holländer.

Mr. Arthur Hervey's highly effective and tuneful Overture, 'Youth,' was played with immense spirit under the composer's inspiring direction; and Monsieur Raoul Pugno gave splendid performances of Saint-Saëns's Concerto and a new Concertstück from his own pen. The last named is a highly ingenious work in three movements, built throughout on a phrase of only three notes. The metamorphoses to which M. Pugno subjects this tiny theme, and the inexhaustible variety of harmonic and rhythmic devices by which the thing is made at all possible, constitute a remarkable tour de force. The piece holds the attention, and works up to a most brilliant climax; our only doubt is on the score of abstract musical beauty. A second hearing may enable us to express a decided opinion on this point. There was only a small, though jubilantly enthusiastic audience, but we hope that Londoners, especially West-Enders who consider themselves judges of good orchestral playing, will not fail to support this most commendable new venture.

The Bach Choir, under the careful conductorship of Dr. H. Walford Davies, gave an excellent concert at St. James's Hall on May 18. A well-balanced chorus gave testimony to careful and artistic training. The programme was admirable, and included Brahms's noble 'Song of Destiny,' Schubert's 92nd Psalm, the solo of which was sung by Mr. Lane Wilson, and Schumann's charming Requiem for 'Mignon.' Brahms's beautiful Lieder and Romanza for female voices, and Sir Hubert Parry's 'Ode to St. Cecilia's Day' were also excellently rendered.

The sonata recital given by Miss Fanny Davies and Dr. Joachim, at St. James's Hall, on May 13, was full of interest owing to the association of these two distinguished artists and the works chosen—Schumann in A minor (Op. 105), Mozart in E flat, Brahms in A major (Op. 100), and Beethoven's 'Kreutzer.' The rendering of the Allegretto in Schumann's composition was most delicate and refined, and showed how completely the executants were in artistic sympathy. The Adagio and closing section of the Mozart Sonata were also most purely and beautifully played, the veteran violinist phrasing the passages with enchanting clearness and delicacy. It was however in the Sonata by Brahms that Dr. Joachim excelled, and it is no wonder that the breadth and grandeur of his style roused the audience to enthusiasm.

The programme of the fifth concert given by the Joachim Quartet—St. James's Hall, May 5—included Sir Charles Stanford's new String Quintet, No. 2 (MS.), Op. 86, composed expressly for Dr. Joachim's Diamond Jubilee. Its most attractive section is perhaps the Scherzo in duple rhythm, while the last movement is a tune of an undoubted Irish type, in the treatment of which the composer is, as usual, conspicuously happy. The work—first performed at Berlin on March 30—was beautifully interpreted by Dr. Joachim and his colleagues (Professors Carl Halir, Emmanuel Wirth, and Robert Hausmann), with the valuable co-operation of Mr. Alfred Gibson as second viola-player.

The amateur orchestral concert conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Sachse at St. James's Hall on May 11 at least served to show the popularity of the violin amongst ladies, for very few of the sterner sex were visible in this department of the orchestra. With rare discretion Mr. Sachse chose works that were within the executive abilities of his orchestra. There was much merit in the interpretation of Beethoven's Second Symphony, albeit the conductor was unable to secure sufficient contrast of light and shade. Madame Henriette Schmeat played the solo part in Mozart's Violin Concerto in E flat, and Miss Isabel Chatto's tasteful singing distinctly added to the pleasure of the evening. The songs contributed by Mr. Gale Gardner were also much appreciated by the numerous audience.

A large and appreciative audience attended Mr. M. Sterling MacKinley's vocal recital at Steinway Hall on May 6. This artist has made great progress in his art, but he still needs to cultivate greater animation. Eighteen songs were mentioned on the programme, amongst which some English ditties were admirably delivered and greatly appreciated. Miss Jean Sterling MacKinley gave some clever and amusing recitations by American authors, and in so doing fully deserved the applause she received.

Mdlle. Szalit, the young Viennese pianist who made such a successful appearance at the Bechstein Hall in January last, concluded on May 11 at the same hall a series of three recitals, in which she may be said to have increased her reputation. Her future progress will be watched with interest.

The St. Margaret's Musical Society, organized with such excellent aims and now strengthened by the addition of an orchestra, gave another successful concert in Caxton Hall, Westminster, on May 17, when Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner' and Faning's 'Song of the Vikings' were performed by the combined forces, the solo vocalists being Miss Eva Hardy, Miss Enid Gabell, Mr. Frederick Norcup, and Mr. Bertram Mills. In the miscellaneous selection the choir were heard to advantage in several madrigals and glees, and the orchestra (led by Mr. Ernest Windust) performed satisfactorily Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, two movements from Haydn's Symphony in G major, and a Ballet Suite arranged from Gluck's opera by Felix Mottl. The Rev. Jocelyn Perkins conducted.

In the Metropolitan Evening Schools under the educational authorities there are some 15,000 pupils in the singing classes. For the purpose of combined performance each district has formed itself into a Choral Union, the idea being to end the winter season's work with a concert on a large scale. In pursuance of this idea the following Unions have recently given performances:—East Lambeth, at Walworth, April 16; conductor, Mr. A. G. Gibbs. West Lambeth, at Battersea Town Hall, April 22—Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' with full orchestra; conductor, Mr. George Lane. Hackney and Finsbury, at the Alexandra Palace—'Hymn of Praise' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast'; conductor, Mr. Allen Gill. Chelsea and Westminster, Queen's Hall, May 11; conductor, Mr. W. T. Oke. All the performances were highly successful, and drew large audiences.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society brought their twenty-sixth season to a successful termination on May 3 with an interesting concert which included Elgar's 'King Olaf' and Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen.' The orchestra, under the able direction of the Society's conductor, Mr. G. H. Betjemann, did justice to the intricacies of Dr. Elgar's score, while the choir were hardly less efficient, especially in their renderings of the choruses 'A little bird in the air' and 'As torrents in summer,' wherein marked intelligence was shown in the phrasing of the various descriptive passages allotted to the different voices. The solo parts were efficiently rendered by Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Andrew Black. The same artists sang the solos in 'The May Queen,' and in addition Miss Edith Mutter took the part of the Queen. The Highbury Philharmonic Society have an excellent record of artistic enterprise and achievement; they are doing excellent work, and deserve every support and encouragement.

The Bermondsey Choral and Orchestral Union gave their final concert of the season in the Town Hall on May 5, when Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' was performed under the direction of the composer. Dr. Cowen was also largely represented in the miscellaneous second part. The singing of the choir was excellent, and the solo vocalists were Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Frederica Richardson, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Dan Price.

The Waverley Orchestral Society gave their first concert at the Parish Hall, Crouch End, on April 28. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, and Overture to 'Prometheus,' Suite in D minor (Lachner), Overture 'Naiades' (Sterndale Bennett), and 'Four Characteristic Waltzes' (S. Coleridge-Taylor). Madame Bessie Dove and Mr. Herbert Browne contributed songs, Miss Ivy Counsell a couple of pianoforte solos, and Miss Marion Aldridge some excellent recitations. Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

The Enfield Musical Union gave a concert at the Byculla Athenæum, Enfield, on May 4, when the chief features of interest in the programme consisted of Alice Mary Smith's 'Ode to the North-East Wind' and Bridge's 'Flag of England.' The choir, which was heard to good effect in both works, also sang excellently in the part-songs, 'Sweet and low,' Barnby, and 'O mistress mine,' Sullivan. There was a full and efficient orchestra, and the solo vocalists were Miss Helen Jaxon and Mr. Miles Moole. Mr. C. H. Churchill conducted.

The St. James's Hatcham Choral Society gave a concert at the National Schools on May 6, when the main feature of the programme was Cowen's 'Rose Maiden.' The solo vocalists were Miss Gwendoline Martin, Miss Ethel Spark, Mr. Elliston Webb and Mr. Frank Swinford. Mr. A. E. Davies conducted.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, May 15.

There has been a lull in concerts since Easter, but performances deserving of mention have been given at the Opera House and at the Conservatorium. At the former, Mahler introduced Verdi's 'Falstaff,' practically as a novelty; it was only given once, several seasons ago, by an Italian company under the direction of Ferrari with Maurel in the title rôle. At the performance in question Kalbeck's excellent German text was used. Herr Demuth as Falstaff delighted the audience by his fine voice and his admirable singing and acting. Fräulein Petru's impersonation of Mrs. Quickly was first-rate, and high praise must also be awarded to the ladies Hilgermann and Gutheil-Schoder. For a work so full of delicate and at times ironic details no abler conductor could be found than Mahler; it is indeed impossible to imagine anything nearer perfection than this 'Falstaff' performance. Frau Lili Lehmann, who appeared as 'Guest,' provided another attraction. As a vocalist she has no equal; on the stage she has only assumed three rôles, those of Norma, Fidelio, and Traviata, and in all three she has been received with such enthusiasm by the public that within a few days each of these operas has been given three times.

Our Conservatorium opera performances have also proved highly satisfactory. In order to give pupils who have been thoroughly trained, and who show artistic taste, opportunity of practising on a big stage, they were given at the 'Theater an der Wien' where, one hundred and thirteen years ago, Mozart's 'Magic Flute' was produced for the first time. The first act of this opera was given twice by the pupils, each time with a different cast. Various acts were also performed from the following operas:—Gluck's 'Der betrogene Kadi,' 'Aida,' 'La Reine de Saba,' 'Figaro,' 'The Barber of Seville,' and 'Trovatore.' Some fresh voices were heard and considerable talent was displayed. Chorus and orchestra, consisting entirely of pupils of the Conservatorium, were under the direction of Herr Von Perger. The public took such active interest in these performances that they will certainly be repeated as soon as possible.

Two new inventions have attracted the attention of specialists. One is a Streich-Clavier, constructed by Herr Kühmeyer, of Pressburg in Hungary. The instrument has the usual keyboard, yet no hammers, but prepared leather strips set in motion by machinery; these so pass over the strings that by strong pressure on the keys a crescendo can be produced on each note; the tone also lasts so long as the key is held down. The tone of the instrument is somewhat similar to that of the harmonium.

The other instrument is an apparatus for recording notes, which can be fitted to any pianoforte near to an electric current. The notes are recorded on five-line staves, in longer or shorter cross-strokes after the manner of telegraphy. It is intended especially to note down improvisations. The inventor is named Kromar, and the instrument is called a Kromarograph.

MANDYCZEWSKI.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The concert season is over, and there is little left to record. On April 28 and 29 Mr. S. S. Stratton gave two lectures on Paganini and his music at the Midland Institute. Mr. John Dunn, the well-known Yorkshire violinist, played a selection of pieces representing as far as possible the whole of Paganini's works. These included the Concertos in E flat and B minor, the Caprices (Op. 1), the Variations, and the Moto Perpetuo. The remarkable performances of Mr. John Dunn, who adopted the tuning of Paganini, evoked the most enthusiastic applause. Mr. H. Wymark Stratton was at the pianoforte.

Music has migrated to the public parks and gardens of the city. The Municipal authorities do not undertake the concerts, but they are given by various bands and musical societies, under an arrangement with the Baths and Parks Committee of the City Council. A small fee is given to each conductor and band, and a nominal charge is allowed for seats within the enclosure. The bands are also permitted to increase their receipts by the sale of programmes, and by placing collecting sheets or boxes at the entrance gates of the parks. This scheme did not work very well last season. People were pleased to listen to the music, but for the most part declined to do anything beyond that. It would be much better to pay the bands properly and make the concerts entirely free.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

The Bristol Choral Society (on April 23) concluded their season with a performance of Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' this being the first concert rendering of the entire work in the city. Choir and band numbered about 600, and Mr. George Riseley conducted with ability. The soloists were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Maud England, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. Alexander Bevan, and Mr. Arthur Deane. Colston Hall was well filled on the occasion, the audience being much impressed by the excellent manner in which the opera was interpreted.

A performance of sacred music took place on April 28 at Radstock in connection with the Bristol District Psalmody Association, which comprises choirs at many places in Somersetshire and Wiltshire, the membership numbering between 400 and 500. The Primitive Methodist Church in which the gathering was held is a large building, and the interpretation of anthems and choruses was of a gratifying character. Mr. F. Stone (Bristol) was the conductor, and Mr. A. C. Storr was at the organ.

The Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, on May 5, gave a concert performance of Balfé's 'Bohemian Girl' at the Pavilion, which was filled by an enthusiastic audience. There was a competent orchestra chiefly composed of Bristol players, Mr. F. S. Gardner leader. The soloists were Madame Adelaide Mullen, Miss Eveline Gerrish, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. F. E. Shellabear, and Mr. Ottley Cranston. Mr. Edward Cook (Bristol) directed the performance.

The Broad Plain House Choir had their annual concert on May 10, with Miss Eveline Gerrish and Mr. Antony Tavener principal vocalists. Mr. H. H. Dennis was leader of the band, and Mr. W. Vaughan Jenkins was conductor; the programme comprised Mr. A. R. Gaul's cantata, 'A Song of Life.'

The members of St. John's Choral Society, Clifton, brought their season to a close on May 17 with a concert in the Parish Hall. The chief feature of the performance was Schumann's cantata 'The Pilgrimage of the Rose,' which interested a large audience. The characters were thus taken:—The Rose, Miss Edith Evans; The Fairy Queen, Mrs. Edith Linnett; Martha, Mrs. M. R. Baker; Max, Mr. H. L. Wensley; The Gravedigger, Mr. C. Venn; The Miller, Mr. Wakeham. The work was well rendered, the choral numbers being sung with animation and good effect. Mr. Harold Bernard was leader of the band, and Mr. A. Ernest Hill (organist of St. John's Church) conducted.

The Fishponds Choral Society successfully performed Mendelssohn's '95th Psalm' in Fishponds Parish Church on May 5 and 8, under the direction of Mr. Percy Stagg.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On May 6 His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland distributed the prizes to the students of the Royal Irish Academy of Music in the Large Hall of the Royal University. The proceedings included a concert given by the pupils. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Jozé, played Nicolai's 'Fest' Overture, Schubert's 'Fierrabras' Overture, and Gounod's March from 'La Reine de Saba.' Instrumental solos were played by Miss Kathleen Hinds and Miss Sylvia Sandall (pianoforte), Mr. Harry McCarthy and Miss Madeleine Moore (violin), Miss Figgis and Miss Porter (violoncello), the vocalists being Miss Kate Carey, Miss Eaton, and Miss Lizzie Gorman.

MUSIC IN GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Two capital concerts given by the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society, which is so ably directed by Mr. C. J. Phillips, deserve notice. The chief work given at that held in the Town Hall on April 5 was Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' but a large and able band played in addition a fantasia by Tschaiikovsky, Brahms's Hungarian Dances (Nos. 5 and 6), Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, and the Triumphal March from Gounod's 'Reine de Saba.' Mr. Phillips's second concert was given with equal success on May 7. The band numbered eighty performers, and amongst the works given were Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, Tschaiikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E, Beethoven's 'Fidelio' Overture, and three of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's orchestral pieces, which were conducted by the composer. Madame Conly was the vocalist.

On May 2 the Charlton King's Choral and Orchestral Society performed Bennett's 'May Queen,' and thus concluded a successful season.

An excellent concert, organized by Mr. J. A. Matthews, was given in the Town Hall, Cheltenham, on May 11, on behalf of the Great Western Railway Servants' Widows and Orphans' Fund. A large number of artists, vocal and instrumental, appeared, and one of the features of the concert was the Orpheus Choir of 50 voices, founded by Mr. Matthews, and who appeared to advantage in their conductor's Choral-song 'God bless the King,' Hatton's 'Ah, could I with fancy stray,' and notably in Lane Wilson's popular Song-cycle 'Flora's holiday,' the effect of the voices being greatly enhanced by their being brought forward to the front of the orchestra.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The fifth annual Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, which was held in St. George's Hall on April 26, was decidedly the most successful of the series. The ensemble-singing was meritorious, and the attack on this occasion was a marked improvement on that of foregoing Festivals. Those responsible are to be congratulated on the increased artistic worth of the result of their labours. The chorus, numbering nearly 700 voices, was drawn from over a score of churches, and the principal vocalists were Sydney Shepperd (the London College for Choristers), Mr. Harold Yates (St. Nicholas Parish Church), Mr. Wilfred Kearton (St. George's Chapel, Windsor), and Mr. Eaton Cooter of the same church. Dr. Peace was at the organ, and Mr. H. H. Branscombe directed the choir.

Much interest centred in the Tschaiikovsky programme put forward by the Societa Armonica on April 27. The orchestra played the 'Pathétique' with praiseworthy finish and effect, and with the aid of a resourceful and accomplished pianist, Mr. E. Howard Jones, the B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto was included in the programme. The 'Hamlet' Overture also had place in the scheme.

MUSIC IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The programme of the Auckland Musical Society on April 28 contained, besides Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' (with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments) and Walthew's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' a Mozart Flute Concerto in D, the solo part of which was interpreted by Mr. A. W. Arlom. Mr. Kilburn conducted, and Miss Nancie Tout and Messrs. W. Kearton and H. Brown were the solo vocalists.

On April 27 'Acis and Galatea' was also performed by the Bywell Choral Society, a country institution with a membership of about fifty, under the baton of Mr. John Walton, and on the same evening an excellent performance of Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner' was given by the Durham Musical Society, at which the solo portions were entrusted to Misses M. S. Watt and Cissy Soulsby, and Messrs. Austin Maloney and Herbert Parker. The orchestra and chorus were under the skilful control of the Society's new conductor, Mr. W. Ellis, assistant-organist of the Cathedral.

Other choral performances have been those of the Spennymoor Musical Society (Rev. Canon Hughes) on May 5, at which Gade's 'Spring's Message' and Stanford's 'Phauidrig Crohoore' were sung with orchestral accompaniment; and the Wallsend Philharmonic Society on April 28 (a very young organization in a rapidly developing town), which, assisted by strings, gave the first two parts of the 'Creation.' Mr. C. J. Gibbon conducted.

Excellent performances of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and Handel's 'Samson' were given at the Choir Festival Services of the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church on May 1 and 2, under the direction of the energetic organist of the church, Mr. George Dodds.

The spectacle of the Mayoress of a city undertaking the prima-donna's rôle in an operatic performance, though a very unusual one, was witnessed in Newcastle on April 14, when, at a charity matinee presentation of Gounod's 'Faust,' the Mayoress (once Miss Lily Heenan of the Carl Rosa Opera Company) undertook the part of Margarita, supported by Messrs. E. C. Hedmond and A. Winckworth, with local amateurs in the minor parts and a large chorus. A high standard was maintained throughout under the guidance of Lieut. H. G. Amers.

MUSIC IN NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the last intermediate concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival, held on March 24, a very satisfactory performance of Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given, Miss Agnes Nichols and Mr. Andrew Black being the vocalists, with Mr. Betjemann as leader of the band and Dr. Mann as conductor. The band consisted of local players considerably augmented for the occasion by London instrumentalists, and the performance throughout was very good, the chorus singing with taste and precision. The second part of the programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

The Norwich Philharmonic Society finished a very successful season with a concert given on April 28, when the second act of Gluck's 'Orpheus' was performed, Miss Giulia Ravogli being the vocalist who delighted the audience by her artistic and dramatic singing. This was followed by Richard Strauss's Concerto in E flat for Horn and Orchestra, the soloist being Mr. A. Borsdorf. Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony was also played with good effect, and Miss Ravogli contributed three songs of varied character by Lassen, Brahms, and Massenet. Dr. Bates conducted with his usual care and skill.

The final organ recital of the season, under the direction of the city organist, Dr. Bunnett, took place at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on April 23, when a miscellaneous programme was presented, and in addition to local artists, Mrs. Reilly Mead and Miss Edith Nutter contributed songs to the programme, and Miss Madeline Booth played two violin solos with artistic feeling and taste.

Great success has attended the performance of 'The Mikado' (Sullivan) by the Norwich Amateur Operatic Company. The new and handsome theatre recently erected at Norwich was crowded at all the performances, which lasted throughout the week commencing May 9. Mr. G. E. Harris was the conductor, and great credit is due to all concerned.

The Norwich Orchestral Union have also finished their season, Dr. Elgar's patriotic cantata 'The Banner of St. George' being the principal feature at the concluding concert, with Madame Louise Burns as principal vocalist, and Mr. Ernest Harcourt as conductor.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The spring concert of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society usually marks the wind-up of the winter season. That given on May 3 in the Albert Hall was no less successful than previous May meetings of the old-established choral body. Under Mr. Schollhammer's expert direction the members gave an excellent performance of MacCunn's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' and Jensen's 'Feast of Adonis.' The distinguishing feature of the Society's performances, beauty of tone, was fully exemplified in both works, and in a new setting of the Te Deum by Mr. J. W. Phillips, the distinguished Sheffield organist, there was no lack of force and enthusiasm.

On May 10 the Male Glee and Madrigal Society gave a concert in the Albert Hall in aid of the Sheffield University Fund. The members were in their best form, and gave proof of their versatility in a selection of glees, madrigals, and part-songs. Wilbye's 'Come, shepherd swains,' Beale's 'Come, let us join the roundelay,' Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch,' were among the most successful items, though the singing of Schumann's beautiful 'Lotus Flower' won the palm for refinement. Mr. John Peck's String Quartet played Beethoven in C (No. 4), and Madame Goodall was the vocalist. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

The successful performance at Easter of Maunders' 'Olivet to Calvary' in the Fulwood Wesleyan Chapel led to a repetition of the pleasing and effective work on April 29, when Mr. J. W. Ibberson was the organist and director.

Notice of the performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' announced to be given on May 31 by the Sheffield Musical Union and the Sheffield Orchestra (the proceeds being devoted to the University Fund) must of necessity be deferred.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

The jury composed of professors and royal music directors (Gebrian, Gebhardt, Handweg, F. and R. Schmidt, H. Schroeder, and E. Schultz) have awarded the prizes for the choral competition this year. M. Koch, music director at Stuttgart (art-song 'St. Michel, salva nos'), and E. Parlou, of Frankfurt-on-Main (folk-song, 'Steht ein Häuschen am Walde'), have won the two first-prizes, each of 200 marks; and Paul Umlauf, of Leipzig (art-song 'Das Mädchen von Inistore'), and royal music director Schwalm, of Königsberg (folk-song 'Einen Brief soll ich schreiben') the two second-prizes, each of 100 marks.—An autograph collection, which belonged to a well-known amateur, was recently sold at Liepmannsohn's. The catalogue, containing over a thousand numbers, included musical autographs by Méhul, Donizetti, Schubert, Beethoven, Weber, Chopin, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Franz Rossini, Wagner, and Brahms.

DORTMUND.

At the fifth and last concert of the Musical Society the director gave a first performance in Germany of G. Doret's 'The Seven last Words of the Saviour,' for soli, chorus, and orchestra. In the second part of the programme Frederic Lamond played Liszt's E flat Concerto, a strange though scarcely suitable contrast.

DRESDEN.

The Neustädter Chorgesangverein and the 'Robert Schumann' Singakademie have joined forces, and it is expected that these combined choirs, under the direction of Albert Fuchs, will play a more influential part in the musical life of this city than either of the separate Societies in the past.

MANNHEIM.

One of the first novelties next season will be a tragic opera, 'Gerhard und Gertha,' text by Ludwig Fernand, music by Les Fall. It is to be produced at the National Theatre under the direction of court capellmeister Willibald Kaehler.

MEININGEN.

The Hofkapelle in former days, under Hans von Bülow, and afterwards under Steinbach, used to make extended concert tours; in like manner the orchestra under its present conductor, Professor Wilhelm Berger, will in the late summer visit a number of German cities.

MILAN.

The Sonzogno prize of £2,000 has been won by the French composer Gabriel Dupont, for his musical drama 'La Cabrera.

MUNICH.

The great painter Franz von Lenbach who died last month was a great friend of Johann Strauss, the Waltz King, and took his portrait. He also took those of Liszt, Bülow, Hermann Levi, and many of Wagner; while of distinguished ladies may be mentioned Sembrich, Lola Beeth, Lilian Sanderson, Fritz Scheff, and last but not least, Yvette Guilbert.

OSNABRÜCH.

Pastor Justus Wilhelm Lyra (1822-1882), composer of the song 'Der Mai ist gekommen,' was a native of this city, and a monument is shortly to be erected to his memory.

PARIS.

The libretto of Johann Strauss's popular operetta 'Die Fledermaus' is based upon the farce by Meilhac and Halévy, entitled 'Le Réveillon,' produced at the Palais Royal in the sixties. Yet the operetta was only performed here for the first time last month at the Théâtre des Variétés, when it achieved a brilliant triumph under the direction of capellmeister Bodansky.—M. Weckerlin has discovered in the Conservatoire library, a little album in morocco with the letter 'H' in gold on the cover, and above it the Imperial crown. The album contains twelve romances composed by Hortense, the mother of Louis Napoleon, with corrections by her teacher M. Carbonel, to whom the album was to be dedicated.

PESARO.

The Court of Appeal at Rome has quashed the judgment of the Pesaro Court ordering the forcible removal of Mascagni from his dwelling in the Liceo. It will be strange if, although not director of the Liceo, he is able to reside in the director's house.

PRAGUE.

Carissimi's oratorio 'Jephta' has been performed here under the direction of Franz Spilka.

STRASSBURG.

Herr F. E. Wittgenstein's grand opera 'Antonius und Kleopatra,' successfully produced here on April 14, has been accepted at the theatres of Dessau, Stettin, and Hamburg, and, according to Die Söngerhalle, also at Covent Garden.

WEIMAR.

A 'Weingartner' orchestral concert was given in the Court Theatre on May 2. Herr Weingartner not only conducted, but the whole of the programme was devoted to his music. It included the symphonic poem 'King Lear,' the Symphony in E flat (Op. 29), and four songs with orchestral accompaniments.

Miscellaneous.

The National Chorus, Toronto, which is the immediate outcome of the visit of Sir Alexander Mackenzie to Canada last year, and which numbers some 160 voices, performed Coleridge-Taylor's cantata 'The Death of Minnehaha,' in Massey Hall, on April 13 (for the first time in Toronto), and the work received an interpretation which would do credit to any choir. The parts were well balanced; the voices fresh and full; the articulation, light and shade, attack, and the occasional dramatic climaxes, all denoted a very careful preparation of the work on the part of both conductor and choir. Dr. Ham's 'Hope of the Ages,' a bright, well-written and effective chorus, with orchestral accompaniment, which was included in the programme, met with an enthusiastic reception. The second concert, on April 14, was brought to a close by another fine performance of Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' which was given also under Dr. Ham's baton at the Mackenzie Festival last year. Dr. Albert Ham, who conducted, was fortunate enough to obtain the co-operation of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and, considering the little opportunity for rehearsal, he is to be complimented on his management of the combined vocal and instrumental forces.

The second triennial Dover Festival took place in the Town Hall on May 4. In the afternoon Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed, the principal vocalists being Madame Emily Squire, Miss Florence Bulleid, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. Charles Tree. In the evening a miscellaneous programme was provided, which included a part-song by B. Mansell Ramsay; a Concert Overture for Organ Solo and Orchestra by J. Weston Nicholl; a choral ballad, 'The Song of the Amal,' by Percy Godfrey; a choral ballad, 'The Legend of St. Martin,' by H. J. Taylor; and Bridge's 'The Inchcape Rock.' Each of these works was conducted by its respective composer, the first four having been written specially for the occasion. Choir and orchestra were alike satisfactory, and the conductor-in-chief was Mr. H. J. Taylor.

The following awards have been made at the Royal Academy of Music:—The Potter Exhibition (Pianoforte) to Emile d'Cisly (of Tunbridge Wells). The Thalberg Scholarship (Pianoforte) to Ambrose Coviello (of London). The Charles Mortimer Prize (Composition) to Victor G. Booth (of Camara, New Zealand). The Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize (Pianoforte) to Irene Scharrer (of London). The Goring Thomas Scholarship (Lyrical Compositions) to Hubert C. Bath (of Barnstaple). The Sterndale Bennett Scholarship to Norman Mayhew (of Wellington). The Parepa-Rosa Scholarship (Singing) to Ethel Gladys Booth (of London). Miss Booth is a daughter and pupil of Mr. Josiah Booth, of Crouch End.

The Oxford House Choral Society (composed entirely of residents in the East-End), the Oxford House Orchestra, and the Excelsior Boys' Choir (of Bethnal Green Board School boys) are uniting their forces and coming westwards on the evening of Tuesday, June 7, when they propose to give a concert at St. James's Hall, under the immediate patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The programme will include Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, and other attractive features. The good work that is being done by the Oxford House fraternity in Bethnal Green deserves every encouragement, especially in the way of practical support.

Mr. Dan Godfrey sends us a tremendous list of compositions which have been performed by the Municipal Orchestra at Bournemouth under his direction between October 5, 1903, and April 30, 1904. Of the total of 226 works, seventy-five were novelties to Bournemouth, eleven being first performances there, and seven first performances in England. That the selection included no fewer than seventy-one works by British composers is a matter for congratulation. The visits of eminent composers such as Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Charles Stanford, Dr. Cowen, and others of lesser degree, have given eclat to these now famous music-makings at Bournemouth.

Gratifying accounts, received from so trustworthy a source as Mr. Ben Davies, have come to hand of some excellent choral singing at Cape Town. On May 2 and 3 two concerts were given at which, in 'The Golden Legend' and the 'Hymn of Praise,' the combined choral societies of the town greatly distinguished themselves. Both these works were rendered with considerable attack, verve, and finish under the able direction of Dr. T. Barrow-Dowling. Mr. Ben Davies has just returned from the most successful tour in South Africa, and it is not surprising that he has received an invitation to re-visit the Cape and also to extend his journeyings to Australasia.

A new Musical Society entitled the 'Berea Choral Society' has recently been formed at Durban, Natal, 'for the practice and performance of high-class choral and other music and to encourage musical taste in the district.' Over 160 applications for active membership have been received, and the conductorship has been placed in the hands of Mr. R. H. MacDonald, Borough Organist of Durban. The opening concert is to take place on June 11, and the works under consideration for subsequent performance are 'Elijah,' 'The Rose of Sharon,' and 'Judith.'

The first performance in Canada of Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Attonement' was given in the Opera House, Calgary, on April 29. So bold a venture for a small city was justified by results, and the maiden efforts of chorus and orchestra were warmly appreciated. Mr. J. S. Dennis was the conductor, Mr. F. B. Cooper organist; and Mrs. Broder (upon whose initiative the work was produced in Calgary) accompanist. In consequence of this successful venture a Philharmonic Society has now been formed in Calgary.

Elgar's 'King Olaf' was produced here for the first time in the States by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, under the direction of Mr. Walter H. Hall, and created a highly favourable impression. The choir sang with remarkable precision, good expression and enunciation, and were particularly successful in the unaccompanied chorus 'As torrents in summer.' The solo vocalists were Mrs. Shanna Cumming, Mr. Theodore van Yox, and Mr. Herbert Witherspoon.

Mr. Henry King, formerly an Assistant Vicar-Choral of St. Paul's Cathedral, has been appointed Secretary to the Abbey Glee Club in succession to the late Mr. F. W. Farmer. Mr. King joined the Club as an honorary performing member in 1878, and since 1893 he has held the post of Librarian.

The Board of Trinity College, London, announce the appointments of the Visiting Examiners for the present year, viz.: Australia, Mr. Charles Edwards; New Zealand and Tasmania, Dr. William Creser; South Africa, Mr. Myles Birket Foster; and India, Mr. Alfred Mistowski.

Dr. Walter Carroll has been appointed Professor of Harmony at the Royal Manchester College of Music, in succession to Dr. Hiles, who has resigned that office, and Miss Fillunger has been appointed a teacher of singing at the same Institution.

The death is recorded as having taken place in New York on April 11 of Mr. George Fitzcurwood Le Jeune, the well-known organist and composer of church music, at the age of 62.

Mr. Charles Phillips is offering a prize of five guineas for 'the best unpublished song (or two short songs) with English words.' Particulars may be obtained from Mr. Charles Phillips, 75, Belsize Park Gardens, N.W.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

ASHBOURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—The programme of the Orchestral Society's concert on May 5 was interesting as contrasting modern French and English orchestral music. It included Gounod's 'Faust' ballet music, Massenet's 'Scènes Pittoresques,' Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, Balfe's Overture 'The Well of Love,' two movements from Sterndale Bennett's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto, and Cowen's 'English Dances in the Olden Style.' Miss Leonora Gray proved a most efficient leader and soloist, Miss Mabel Tutt gave a good account of the Concerto, and Mr. W. H. Tutt conducted as usual. Songs were agreeably sung by Miss Agnes Paddon.

ASHBURTON.—Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was given in the Parish Church on May 10 by the Ashburton Choral Society, assisted by Dr. Weekes's Choral and Orchestral Societies, Plymouth Royal Marine Band, Newton, Totnes, and Teignmouth Choral Societies. The solo vocalists were Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss May Groser, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Albert Collings, and Mr. Charles Knowles, all of whom sang admirably. The oratorio was preceded and followed by prayer. The congregation followed the oratorio with remarkable interest, and the opinion is general in the whole of the district that it was one of the most religiously-impressive services ever given in the fine old Parish Church. Mr. Harold O. Jones, upon whom falls the burden of directing the affairs of the Society, conducted.

BASINGSTOKE.—Coleridge-Taylor's cantata 'Scenes from Hiawatha' (complete) was performed by the Choral Society in the Drill Hall on April 26. The solo vocalists were Miss Beatrice Spencer, Mr. Alexander Webster, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. The choir and orchestra (led by Mr. Charles Griffiths) numbered over 100 performers, and Mr. H. E. Powell conducted.

CROYDON.—Under the auspices of the Surrey Congregational Union a Choral Festival was held on May 4 at the George Street Congregational Church. The choir numbered 250, drawn from Battersea, Croydon, Egham Hill, Epsom, Ewell, Kingston, Reigate, Tooting, West Dulwich, and West Norwood, and their singing was most impressive, reflecting much credit upon those who had trained the various sections and upon the conductor, Mr. Leonard H. Snow. Mr. William Johns presided at the organ and gave a short recital prior to the service.

EPHING.—The Epping Choral Society concluded their thirteenth season with a Festival of English music, given at afternoon and evening concerts in the Town Hall, on May 4. The afternoon programme included Stanford's 'Revenge,' while Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' formed the first part of the evening concert. The part-songs 'O happy eyes' (Elgar) and 'Sweet and low' (Barnby) were finely sung by the excellent choir, which has twice won first-prize for choral singing at the Stratford Musical Festival. Mention must be made of the clarinet solo, Andante and Tarantella, by Edward German, played by Mr. F. M. Wood, and the violin solo, Cowen's 'Réverie,' performed by Mr. Burnett Carter, the principal violin of the orchestra. The capital orchestra of twenty-one players was heard alone in Mackenzie's 'Benedictus' and German's 'Coronation March.' Songs were contributed by the principals—Miss Stella Maris, Madame Marie Mallia, Miss Minnie Chamberlain, Mr. Fred. Norcup, and Mr. Bertram Mills. Mr. Horace Norton assisted at the pianoforte, and Mr. Henry Riding at the harmonium. The conductor was Mr. Donald Penrose, who presides at the magnificent four-manual organ in the large Parish Church, and who is to be warmly congratulated upon the success of the Festival no less than upon the good choir under his able direction.

EYE.—The Musical Society gave a performance of Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' and a miscellaneous selection, on May 3, at the Town Hall. The choir, assisted by a small orchestra, gave a satisfactory rendering of their portion of the work, and the solo vocalists were Miss Mildred Rix, Miss Margaret Wilson, Mr. James Davis, and Mr. George Stubbs. Mr. J. W. Bray conducted.

JERSEY.—The Jersey Choral Society held their twenty-second annual Festival at the Opera House in St. Helier on April 21 and 22. The Society has a membership of about 150, who form the chorus and the bulk of the orchestra. 'The Death of Minnehaha' was given on the first evening, followed by a miscellaneous programme in which the orchestra played Dr. Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March in a manner that spoke well for their careful training. On the second night of the Festival, when 'The Creation' was sung, the Society gave one of the best performances since its institution. The choir was well balanced, and in both works gave a splendid interpretation of the music. The orchestra was also good, and their accompaniment to the solo numbers was in commendable taste. The solo vocalists, Miss Kate Cherry, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Arthur Barlow, were also efficient. Mr. C. R. Bicks, who was this year's conductor, is to be highly congratulated upon the success achieved.

LANCASTER.—The first annual general meeting of the Lancaster Ladies' Choir was held in the Storey Institute on May 11. The accounts were presented and adopted, and committee and officers elected for the ensuing season. At the conclusion of the business, Miss C. Dawson, on behalf of the members, presented Mr. J. W. Aldous with a handsome travelling clock, in recognition of his services as conductor. Mr. Aldous thanked the ladies for their kind appreciation of his work, and congratulated them on having had a very successful season.

LINCOLN.—The final concert this season of the Musical Society took place in the New Central Hall on May 5, when a miscellaneous programme was presented. The choir, who were in excellent form, rendered excellent service in Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' Bach's motet for double chorus, 'Be not afraid,' Pearsall's 'Sir Patrick Spens,' and the conductor's 'Evening' (which was encored); the male and female sections of the choir being heard respectively in two part-songs by Elgar and the 'Evening Song of the Maidens' from Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' the ladies carrying off the honours! Miss Perceval Allen was the solo vocalist, and Mr. John Dunn's contributions on the violin were much appreciated. Dr. G. J. Bennett conducted with his customary skill and care.

SAXMUNDHAM.—The Choral Society gave a concert performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' followed by a miscellaneous selection, in the Market Hall on April 28. The singing of the choir was altogether admirable, and they were well supported by an excellent orchestra. The solo vocalists were Madame Lilian Green (who doubled the parts of Eurydice and Love) and Miss Florence Etlinger. Mr. Charles Ganz conducted.

SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.—Mr. Russell Bonner gave a pianoforte recital of ten pieces by Chopin, in the Hall of the Technical Institute, on May 14. Songs were interspersed by Miss Grace Day Winter, and Mr. Riddell Hunter, also violoncello solos by Mr. C. T. Loveday. Mr. R. W. Robson was the accompanist. The recital was repeated at Earlharn Hall, Forest Gate, on May 17, with vocal and violin solos by Madame Gertrude Gardner and Miss Lilian Marshall, the accompanist being Miss Florence Harth.

VALETTA (Malta).—The newly-formed Musical Union gave their first concert in the Princess Theatre, Floriana, on April 26, when Stanford's 'The Revenge' was performed, followed by a miscellaneous selection which included Cooke's glee 'Strike the lyre,' and the part-songs 'O forest, deep and gloomy' and 'Vale of rest' (Mendelssohn), and 'The long day closes' (Sullivan); also several selections by the orchestra. Mr. W. S. Robinson conducted.

WEDNESBURY.—Mr. Arthur Cooke gave a concert in the Town Hall on May 12, when the programme consisted entirely of compositions by the concert-giver, and included a Sonata in E minor for Violin and Pianoforte (Op. 12); a Trio for Pianoforte and Strings, in C minor (Op. 10); and various solos for voice, violin, and violoncello, the interpreters being Miss Helene Valma and Mr. Nat Bishop (vocalists), Mr. William Henley (violin), Mr. Percy Hall (violoncello), and Mr. Cooke (pianoforte). The compositions as a whole displayed considerable merit.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—A very interesting programme of old English songs and madrigals was given in the Central Hall on May 10, at a concert organized by Miss M. L. Pendered on behalf of the Wellingborough Cottage Hospital. The vocalists were Mrs. G. H. Woolston, Miss May Pendered, Miss Ruth James, Miss Rose Birkett, and the Apollo Quartet, the accompaniments being ably played by Mr. G. H. Woolston.

WORKSOP.—The Musical Society gave a Soirée Musicale in the Town Hall on May 19. The first part consisted chiefly of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata 'The Bride,' Miss Marjorie Eaton and Mr. Hopkinson were the solo vocalists, and Mr. Hamilton White conducted.

WREXHAM.—The Triennial Musical Festival of the Welsh Congregationalists of Denbighshire and Flintshire was successfully held on May 9 at the Drill Hall. The conductor was Mr. Caradog Roberts, organist of Bethlehem Congregational Church, Rhoslanerchrugog. The united choir consisted of 1,500 voices, accompanied by an excellent orchestra led by Mr. H. Hazelden, of Rhyl, whilst the organists were Mr. A. George, of Talwrn, and Mr. S. M. Evans, of Mold.

YORK.—The Symphony Orchestra established by Mr. Tertius Noble, chiefly to provide high-class concerts for the pleasure and culture of the humbler citizens—a large number of seats being provided at the modest sum of one penny—gave a concert on May 4, when the programme included Mozart's 'Prague' Symphony, Overture 'Der Freischütz,' Stanford's Irish Rhapsody, and Moszkowski's Suite 'From foreign parts,' these works being excellently played under Mr. Noble's inspiring direction. Mr. F. Harford was the vocalist. Mr. Noble's artistic enterprise deserves more hearty support from the wealthier members of the community than it at present receives.

Answers to Correspondents.

ON SLOW.—(1) The following harvest anthems may suit your requirements: 'Praise ye the Lord' (Garrett), 'The eyes of all' (Gaul), 'Blessed be the name of the Lord' (Gadsby), 'O come, let us sing' (Tours), 'Sing praises to God' (Wareing); and for Christmas: 'Let us now go even unto Bethlehem' (J. T. Field), 'O Zion that bringest good tidings' (Stainer), 'Sing and rejoice,' and 'The grace of God' (Barnby), and 'Rejoice in the Lord' (Hollins). (3) So far as we can gather from your music example the melody you seek is Schubert's 'Ave Maria.'

L. H.—For biographies of the composers you mention consult Rockstro's 'Handel'; Cummings's 'Purcell' (Great Musicians Series); the articles in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' on Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Palestrina, Schubert, and Schumann. A good biographical sketch of Brahms is included in 'Masters of Modern German Music,' by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, and Mrs. Newmarch is now engaged upon an English translation of M. Modeste Tschaikovsky's 'Life' of his distinguished brother.

EAST ANGLIA.—Sir Julius Benedict was born at Stuttgart on November 27, 1804, and died in London, June 5, 1885. He conducted the Norwich Musicals triennially from 1845 to 1878 (except that the meeting of 1851 was postponed till the following year); but he is best remembered by his opera 'The Lily of Killarney,' composed in 1862, and his oratorio 'St. Peter,' written for the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1870.

J. A.—(1) The song that you send is a four-part arrangement of the seventeenth-century song 'The Vicar of Bray.' (2) The Overture on Melodies from Rossini, by Mercadante, is published for orchestra only; it is on themes from the 'Stabat Mater.' (3) For Storm Fantasias for the organ, see those composed by Lemmens, Neukomm, Lefebure-Wely, Claussmann, and Blanchette.

G. B.—The song 'Schlage-doch' was originally written by Bach for a soprano voice with accompaniment for strings. Similarly accompanied songs by Bach are: 'Auf, freue dich Seele,' 'Dein sonst hell beliebter Schein,' 'Die Armen will der Herr umarmen,' and 'Doch bin und bleibe ich vergnügt.' All the above compositions are published in full-score only, not the orchestral parts.

A. J. B.—(1) The Cotta edition of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas will help you. (2) 'Sonata Form' by W. H. Hadow; 'Analysis of Form, as displayed in Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas,' by H. A. Harding (Novello's Primers); and Professor Prout's 'Musical Form' and 'Applied Forms' (Augener and Co.).

ETUDIANT.—Leopold Godowski was born at Wilna (Vilna), Poland, February 13, 1870. In addition to being an eminent pianist he has composed upwards of 100 works, most of which remain in manuscript. He began to compose at the age of seven.

CARMEN.—Yes, Max Bruch's chorus 'The flight of the Holy Family' (Op. 20) is published with English words. The same composer's 'The flight into Egypt,' for soprano solo, chorus of female voices, and orchestra is issued with German text only.

IGNORAMUS.—It is desirable to write music on one side of the paper only if it is going to be published, as time may thereby be saved in the setting up or engraving, and moreover the value of the manuscript is not impaired by being cut up and distributed among several compositors or engravers.

L. C. B.—There are no 'rules' exactly for 'arranging a piece for mixed voices (S.A.T.B.)' so as to suit male voices (A.T.T.B.); but in order to evolve an effective arrangement it is not only necessary to know the compass of the respective voices, but to be familiar with male-voice music.

M. J. K.—In regard to humorous operas after the style of Sullivan's 'Trial by Jury,' give the following a trial: 'Lady Laura's Hand,' by Florian Pascal; 'The Spectre Knight,' by Alfred Cellier; and 'Son and Stranger,' by Mendelssohn.

LUDO.—We are unable to discover if the Overture to 'Tancredi' has been arranged for the organ. It is a composition that is hardly suited to that instrument.

J. P.—The pieces you mention, though without reproach in their particular sphere, are hardly of sufficient difficulty as test-pieces at the Associateship Examination of the Royal College of Organists.

TENOR.—To sing the top A flat in 'Then shall the righteous' (Mendelssohn) would be a most inartistic proceeding, notwithstanding the fact that Mario did so at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1849.

READER.—Ladies are permitted to enter the examinations for degrees in music at Oxford, but not to take the degrees; they receive a certificate, that is if they satisfy the examiners.

H. L. L. — An illustrated article on Ely Cathedral appeared in our issue of March, 1902. Durham has yet to be similarly treated.

DECANI.—Many thanks for your appreciative letter; we are glad of the suggestion contained therein, and will certainly consider it.

S. M.—(1) We do not know of any book on the 'Schumann Method of pianoforte teaching.' (2) A review of Mr. Matthay's 'Act of Touch' appeared in our May issue.

W. J. M.—We are sorry that we cannot trace the composers of the songs 'I love old Ireland still,' and 'My Queen of Hearts.'

IXION.—Stainer's Organ Primer to start with, and for easy organ voluntaries consult 'The Village Organist' (36 books), and G. Calkin's 'Soft Voluntaries' (16 books).

J. D. S.—Cardiff would be the best centre in Wales, though musical culture is not confined to any particular spot.

IKKE.—No, we have not.

ELÉANORE

SONG

THE POEM WRITTEN BY

ERIC MACKAY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR

(Op. 37, No. 6).

"The second novelty was a tenor song, 'Eléanore,' a recent composition by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. It has melody of an expressive and thoroughly vocal character, and the orchestral colouring is charming if not almost too luscious in effect. Mr. Coates sang it with finished phrasing, and with an expression which was intimate without being in the least overstrained."—Yorkshire Post, April 14, 1904.

FORTY-EIGHT PRELUDES AND FUGUES

OF
JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH
ANALYSED FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS

BY FREDERICK ILIFFE
M.A., MUS. DOC., OXON.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"The object of the present analysis is to place in the hands of students a detailed and exhaustive scheme of every Prelude and Fugue. In the Preludes the mode of procedure has been: (1) To give the Figure upon which each Prelude is built; (2) to give the Prelude itself in full and copiously marked, or in a reduced form showing the structure; (3) a 'Summary' of the piece; and lastly, general 'Remarks' upon the structure and treatment of the materials. For the Fugues a Tabulated Analysis—bar by bar—is first given, then a 'Summary' and 'Remarks' as before."

Single Specimen copies sent post-free to the Clergy and Organists, on application to the Publishers direct, at the following prices: Hymns, with Tunes, 2s.: Hymns only, 8d.

PREFACE.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals. For this reason, the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern, so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The lack of certain well-known hymns in that book and the need of extra hymns for certain occasions are often felt. This is clear from the fact that many supplemental appendixes and leaflets are now used with it, particularly books for mission services, children's use, and other special occasions.

It may be said by many that we already have too many hymns, and that a large number are most unsuitable. There is no subject upon which persons differ more thoroughly than the suitability of different hymns. No two people will ever agree as to all the hymns in any collection. The only way of dealing satisfactorily with this problem seems to be to give a comprehensive compilation, together with guidance as to the character of each hymn. Hence, in the index of first lines a letter has been prefixed to each hymn giving an indication as to its characteristic—whether a hymn of direct praise, a prayer, or sentimental, historical, etc., etc. Those who object to hymns of any particular class can, therefore, easily avoid their use.

Guided by these two principles, hymns have been included for the following reasons:—

1. Hymns which, being in constant request, are inserted, not necessarily because of their merit, but rather because they have been found to be of real use in many cases.
2. Since the formation of other hymn books, much greater prominence has been given to music in connection with Choral Celebrations, and with this has grown a want of more hymns, especially short ones of one or two verses for different parts of the service.
3. So also has there grown a demand for further hymns on Almshousing, for Processionals of a greater length than usual, for Harvest, Flower, and Mission Services, besides other special occasions.
4. Finally, it is felt by very many to be a mistake to accustom children to the use of a Children's hymn book which will be discarded when they have grown older. Far better is it to accustom them at once, when young, to love the hymn book which they will use in after life. For this purpose a few more children's hymns than are supplied in other books seem to be wanted.

* * We most strongly recommend this Cantata to all in search of a good and popular work for a Harvest Festival. The libretto (by the late Rev. SAMUEL BARBER) is founded on a most interesting analogy which is well conceived and well carried out, and we venture to say that there is not one dull page in the music, from the solemn opening "The earth was without form and void" to the triumphant and inspiring conclusion "And He shall reign for ever and ever."

NINE SYMPHONIES

BY

GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

PRICE, CLOTH, GILT, SIX SHILLINGS.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.

EXPRESSION

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

"Mr. W. H. Reed, a violinist-member of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, who met with an extremely hearty reception after the first performance of his 'Suite Venitienne' at the Promenade Concerts last night, quite defies our criticism by his fearlessness in writing tunes and by the cheerfulness and brightness of his work. For Mr. Reed and his music there is no need of the cheap philosophy which does duty so easily for the 'poetical basis' of so much of our young composers' music. He writes as he feels, evidently; and he writes not only well but sincerely. Small wonder, then, that his suite captivated a very large audience, which recalled him again and again. His suite is not strikingly original. But it is fresh and cheery, unpretentious and clear, and, above all, healthy-minded. . . . In the presentment of his ideas Mr. Reed shows almost a master-hand—largely owing, no doubt, to the fact of his being a member of an orchestra; and in as great a degree as is possible his scoring, admirable and rich and full as it is, compensates for a lack of distinct originality in his thematic material. In any case, however, his suite deserves high rank among the novelties that have been produced this season at these admirable concerts."—The Times.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FROM THE ABOVE :

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

London to sing 'The Crusaders,' proved a great acquisition to the Society. His voice is a pure and very sweet tenor, over which he

MR. MONTAGUE BORWELL

(BARITONE).

(Westminster Abbey.)

Mr. HENRY J. WOOD (Conductor, Queen's Hall Concerts) writes:—

"1, Langham Place, W., Feb. 14, 1901.

"Mr. Montague Borwell is an excellent vocalist.

"He has been most successful both at Queen's Hall, and at my Nottingham and Wolverhampton Concerts, in most difficult and trying rôles, and I consider him one of the most reliable and painstaking baritone vocalists now before the public.

"HENRY J. WOOD."

"ELIJAH" (COLERAINE).—"His Elijah is a fine performance. Not a point was missing. There are supreme traditions of this part, and it can only be said that Mr. Borwell fully rivalled the best."—Belfast Evening Telegraph, March 10, 1904.

"ELIJAH" (WESLEYAN CHOIRS FESTIVAL).—"Mr. Montague Borwell as the Prophet was admirably suited to the part. He has a fine voice—very musical, and with an unusual degree of dramatic force."—Holloway and Hornsey Gazette, Nov. 6, 1903.

"ELIJAH" (BRIGHTON).—"Mr. Montague Borwell merits unstinted praise for the masterly manner in which he gave the solos allotted to Elijah. He was grandly effective in his recitatives, and aroused great enthusiasm by his superb renderings of the airs 'Lord God of Abraham' and 'It is enough.'"—Sussex Daily News, March 18, 1904.

"ELIJAH" (CLAPTON).—"The vivid portrayal of the great Prophet's work was grandly rendered by Mr. Montague Borwell."—Recorder, April 15, 1904.

"ELIJAH" (BROMLEY).—"The title-part was splendidly interpreted by Mr. Montague Borwell. He made a great and genuine success throughout, and in 'Is not His Word' he produced a profound impression."—Bromley Chronicle.

"FAUST" (GOUNOD).—(GOLDSMITHS' INSTITUTE).—"Mr. Montague Borwell in the part of Valentine sang excellently, and from his first note in the second act, right through the 'Duel' scene with its splendid male trio, to the last note of his extremely dramatic 'Death' scene was listened to with the keenest appreciation by all."—Journal, March, 1904.

"ELIJAH" (SUNDERLAND).—"The feature of the performance was the brilliant work of Mr. Montague Borwell. He possesses a magnificent voice, and as Elijah sang with rare dramatic power."—Sunderland Daily Post, April 21, 1904.

"ACIS AND GALATEA" (SITTINGBOURNE).—"Real enthusiasm was not, however, aroused until Mr. Montague Borwell made his appearance on the scene. In 'O ruddier than the cherry' he made the great 'hit' of the evening. He was in splendid voice, and the familiar air was superbly rendered. The runs were taken with consummate ease, and when Mr. Borwell finished with a double octave, the 'house' fairly rose at him: such a storm of enthusiasm being aroused as we have not seen in Sittingbourne for years."—East Kent Gazette, May 14, 1904.

"HIAWATHA" (DORKING).—"The intensity of the distressed man's cry was sung by Mr. Montague Borwell with a declamatory poignancy most touching to listen to, and made a deep impression on the hearers."—Dorking Advertiser, April 30, 1904.

AND

MISS WINIFRED MARWOOD

(Mrs. Montague Borwell—SOPRANO).

Of the Royal Albert Hall, Alexandra Palace, Crystal Palace, and Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, &c.

"ELIJAH" (CLAPTON).—"Miss Winifred Marwood has a soprano voice of singular purity; and the many difficult numbers which fell to her: here were given with a musical charm and grace which won for her golden opinions. Her best effort, to our mind, was the air 'Hear ye, Israel.'"—Recorder, April 15, 1904.

"FAUST" (GOUNOD).—(GOLDSMITHS' INSTITUTE).—"In the character of Margarita Miss Winifred Marwood was all that could be desired, and gave the difficult 'Jewel' song excellently. She was also very good in the 'Prison' scene terminating with the brilliant trio for Margarita, Faust, and Mephistopheles."—Journal, March, 1904.

"ELIJAH" (SUNDERLAND).—"Miss Winifred Marwood was in fine voice, and her share of the work was excellently performed; particularly was this so in the duet 'What have I to do with thee.'"—Daily Post, April 21, 1904.

"CREATION" (CLYDEBANK).—"Miss Winifred Marwood sang all her solos with fervour and charm. She has a cultured voice, fresh and resonant, and a good concert-platform style. At the close of the air 'With verdure clad' she had to repeatedly bow her acknowledgments to the enthusiastic applause of the audience."—Clydebank Press.

"MESSIAH" (BOSTON).—"Miss Winifred Marwood possesses a pure soprano voice, most flexible and clear, which was shown to great advantage in the florid style of some of her airs, her voice being flute-like in the trills and beautiful throughout."—Boston Independent.

HANDEL'S "L'ALLEGRO" (BRIGHTON).—"To a large extent the gratification yielded by the performance came from the singing of Miss Winifred Marwood. Not often does the Society get a singer so thoroughly suited to her work. Her voice—a soprano of the highest range—was sweet and rounded, and rang clear and musical in every note."—Brighton Herald, February 14, 1904.

THE TERCENTENARY EXHIBITION OF THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

Assuming that the announced arrangements were carried out, the above Exhibition was opened by the Prince of Wales on June 27, after these pages had gone to press. By the courtesy of one or two of the exhibitors we are enabled to make mention of a few of the lesser-known treasures that will be on view at Fishmongers' Hall. The following notes may therefore serve the purpose of an introductory article on this interesting Exhibition.

Among the old keyboard instruments one of the most attractive is the fine harpsichord lent by the Countess Dudley. This very beautiful instrument—which her Excellency has kindly allowed us to photograph—was made in 1642 by Hans Ruckers the younger, son of the founder of that famous family of Flemish harpsichord makers. It has two keyboards,—black naturals and white sharps—in compass $4\frac{1}{2}$ octaves, B to D, and four stops. The exquisitely decorated case naturally excites wonderment and interest. However good a photograph may be,—and we venture to think that our reproduction leaves little to be desired—it is impossible to give an idea of the rich coloration of this old-world instrument. Such rich decoration was often bestowed upon these instruments even a hundred years after they had been made. New keyboards were introduced, and, if there were room for additional strings, a wider range of compass. In the harpsichord belonging to the Countess Dudley this last alteration does not appear to have taken place and the original stops have been retained. It is a lovely instrument, and a charming specimen of decorative art. (Illustration on p. 431.)

Closely akin to the harpsichord above described is a virginal lent by Mr. Arthur F. Hill, one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Exhibition. This decorated virginal, formerly in the possession of Nell Gwyn, was manufactured by Adam Leversedge, an English maker, in 1666, the year of the great fire of London. The photograph shows that the subject of the painting on the instrument is the Mall in St. James's Park, with a distant view of Arlington House. The virginal (pair of virginals)—in Italian, spinetta a tavola, in French, clavecin rectangulaire—is properly an oblong spinet, made like an Italian wedding coffer, or cassone. This make of instrument appears to have been adopted in England simultaneously with the spinetta traversa—the ordinary English spinet of Haword, Keene, and the Hitchcocks. The painting, embossing, and gilding of this virginal are all as fresh as if they had been recently done. (Illustration on p. 433.)

The violin of which we give a photograph was made, carved, and played upon by George Romney, the artist (1734-1802). The son of a carpenter, joiner and cabinet-maker, Romney at first followed his father's trade. In this connection and also that of his violin playing, we may quote from Hayley's 'Life' of the painter:—

Having discovered at that period [the age of twelve] a great passion for mechanics, he employed himself in a variety of devices; particularly in carving small figures on wood, to which he was led by the ardour of early uninstructed genius. He was enthusiastically fond of music, and passed much time in various experiments to extract from the article on Romney in the 'Dictionary of National Biography':—

He distinguished himself in the manufacture of fiddles, many of which he ornamented with elaborate carving. His passion for music first suggested these experiments, and a fiddle of his own make became a common present to his boyish companions. One such gift to a former schoolfellow named Greene inaugurated a lifelong friendship of great value to Romney in later years. Greene became an attorney of repute in London, and make violins of different shapes and powers. In advanced life he took great delight in recollecting this ingenious industry that he exerted as a boy. He carefully preserved the favourite violin of his own construction, and has been heard to play upon it in the house which he had filled with the productions of his pencil, a singular coincidence of arts in the person of one man.

Further information regarding this fiddle-maker and violinist-painter is furnished in the following Romney's chief adviser in all business matters. He audited the painter's confused accounts, and managed all his money transactions.

Among the many portraits that are exhibited is that of Haydn, which we are permitted to reproduce: it is by Thomas Hardy, an artist of repute at the end of the eighteenth century. Painted during the genial old Papa's first visit to this country (1791-2), the portrait was exhibited at the Royal Academy. Haydn, having received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at the University of Oxford, was thereupon elected a member of the Musical Graduates' Society, a social organization which occupied itself with the peaceful pastime of dining. Haydn invited his fellow-graduates to dinner on June 20, 1792, the feast taking place at Parsloe's, a famous old coffee-house which stood on the western-side of St. James's Street. At the new graduate's particular request, Mr. Salomon was allowed to be present 'partly as an intimate friend of Dr. Haydn, and partly as an interpreter, Dr. Haydn having not made sufficient progress in the English tongue.'³

We may now turn to the interesting subject of music-printing. The earliest known instance of printed music is of the year 1473, when Conrad Fyner, of Esslingen, printed the Collectorium super Magnificat of Jean Charlier de Gerson. Born at Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, in 1363, this author was one of the most eminent scholars and divines of his time. His Collectorium is a mystical elaboration of the ideas conveyed by the words of the Magnificat. The thesis in which occurs the music example is contained in the following (translated) extract:—

Whosoever will carefully consider, will find that all healthful meditation, whether of divine or human learning, can be reduced to five words, of which the first four refer to God, e.g., magnificence, munificence, mercy, justice; the fifth is special to man, namely misery. So every song of the spirit and heart must be formed upon one of the five words aforesaid, or upon two, three or altogether. Similarly all affections of the heart and spirit may be reduced to five—namely joy, hope, compassion, fear, grief. Applying each word in the letters of each meditation, to the expression of the harmonizing affection, according to the order here laid down, then the five vowels placed in their natural order are the notes indicating to which expression the letter is adapted, by depression and elevation also, just as in the hand scale (gamma manualis) sol, fa, mi, re, ut. Or let the natural order of the vowels, taking away the consonants, be put, as shown in the following figure:—

vocales ordine naturali posite notule sunt indicatæ cui voci lra fit accomo da etiā p depressiōē et eleuatiōē ad instar game natat sol/fa/mi/re/ut/
Aut ponat ordo nature vocalium deptis consonantiæ ut p; in hac figura—

But we do not wish anyone to think that the present scale of all mystic songs suffices for heart and spirit to be forthwith able to sing efficaciously. (And so on.)

The facsimile forming part of the above extract is from Mr. Alfred Littleton's fine copy of Gerson's Collectorium. There are two separate printings of the music in the original—the notes are black, the lines red. Moreover, it is important to observe that the notes were printed at the same time as the letterpress, that is to say, they were not punched in afterwards. A collation—kindly made for the purposes of this article by Mr. G. F. Barwick, Superintendent of the British Museum Reading Room—of the British Museum copy with that from which our facsimile is taken, proves beyond a doubt that the notes were not punched by hand, but that they were printed at the same time as the text; this confirms the opinion expressed by Mr. Robert Steele on page 2 of his valuable monograph on 'The Earliest English Music Printing.'

It should however be pointed out that, unlike Mr. Littleton's, the British Museum copy—which, by-the-way, is not quite perfect—is minus the lines. And so is the facsimile reproduction (Fig. 2) in Mr. Steele's book. Did the rubricator omit them by accident or design? Surely the former, as without the lines the clef has no meaning. The point is an interesting one which seems hitherto to have escaped notice.

The first music printed in England is found in Higden's 'Polychronicon,' a book 'Enprynted at Westmestre by Wynkyn The worde' in the year 1495. This venerable tome contains one music example, which we give in facsimile on p. 434. The passage in which the notes occur describes the consonances of Pythagoras. The double octave is wrongly printed—it contains a note too much! We can imagine Mr. Wynkyn de Worde, the pupil and successor of Caxton, or one of his 'intelligent comps,' dealing with this music example when the 'copy' of 'Polychronicon' had to be set. With that adaptability to circumstances not unknown in printers' composing-rooms of the present day, Mr. de Worde cast about to see how he could manage to do this 'music job' with materials ready at hand. 'Rules and quads,' quoth he, 'put them together, and there you are'! Thus by a pure accident, or, to be more accurate, a practical application of the old adage 'necessity is the mother of invention,' Wynkyn de Worde really, though unconsciously, invented type music-printing—that is to say, the printing of the lines and notes at one impression.

Our next facsimile is an illustration from a very rare book,— of which only five copies are said to exist—the 'Musica getutscht' of Sebastian Virdung, author of this the oldest work describing the precursors of modern musical instruments. The book (a small oblong 9 in. by 5½ in.) is written in dialogue and is quite encyclopædic in its survey. The illustrations are by no means the least attractive feature. The page which we reproduce shows (1) the Orgel with its three divisions of pipes, (2) the Positive, a chamber organ, and (3) the Regale, an instrument which consists of a single row of beating reeds, and interesting as being in some respects the prototype of the modern harmonium. Turning to the letterpress of this quaint old book—published at Basel in 1511—we find some curious views therein expressed. For instance, we are told that drums are instruments which cause 'much unrest (or tribulation) to pious old people, to sick folk, and to the devout in cloisters who have to read, and study, and pray'; moreover, so little do the drums find favour with our author that he goes so far as to say: 'I verily believe that the devil has invented and made them'! What would Virdung say were he to attend an orchestral concert in Queen's Hall?

The Exhibition has its lighter side—why not? We find a trade-card of a musical instrument seller of long ago which reads thus:—

All Sorts of Trumpetts and Kettle Drums, ffrench Hornes, Speaking Trumpetts, Hearing Hornes for Deafe people & all Sorts of powder flasks and aliso Wind Gunes made and minded by WILLIAM BULL Trumpett maker to his Maiestie, Who liveth att the Signe of the Trumpett and Horne in Castal Street Neare the Muye.

Above the card are drawings of the 'all sorts' which were to be obtained of Mr. William Bull, the list of whose wares, procurable 'neare the Muye,' is amusing. The late Thomas Harper, the distinguished trumpet player, possessed a trumpet made by William Bull, an instrument that is shown in the Exhibition.

The Paganini collection contains the following protest in the form of a handbill (12 in. by 7½ in.), evidently distributed and placarded about Bristol during the visit of the great violinist to that city in 1831, just after the terrible riots when upwards of 500 persons were killed by the military or otherwise perished. It is no wonder that the uncanny fiddler played to half-empty houses. Here is the bill of indictment against one of 'the tribe of Foreign Music-monsters':—

PAGANINI.

To the CITIZENS OF BRISTOL.

Fellow Citizens,—

It is with feelings of unqualified disgust, that I witness the announcement of Signor Paganini's Performance to take place in this City: why at this period of Distress? with the recollection of so many scenes of misery still fresh in our minds, and whilst SUBSCRIPTIONS are required to the extent of our means, in order to FEED and CLOTHE the POOR: why is this Foreign Fiddler now to appear? for the purpose of draining those resources which would be infinitely better applied to the exercise of the best feeling of man-CHARITY!

Do not suffer yourselves to be imposed upon, by the Payment of charges which are well worthy of the name of extortion: rather suffer under the imputation of a want of Taste, than support any of the tribe of Foreign Music-monsters, who collect the Cash of this country and waft it to their own shores, laughing at the infatuation of John Bull.

An interesting meeting in London between Paganini and Mendelssohn, when they both took part in some concerted music, is thus recorded:—

PAGANINI.—It has been frequently said that this extraordinary performer could not take part in a quartet with any effect. This is far from being correct. At a soirée given by Dr. Billing the other evening, Paganini, Mendelssohn, and Lindley performed a trio for viola, guitar, and violoncello (composed by Paganini), Mendelssohn playing the guitar part on the pianoforte, adding a bass, in the most ingenious manner. Paganini's performance on the tenor was of the true school; there were no tricks, no jumping and skipping, but all the passages were legitimately and beautifully played, as were those given to the violoncello by Lindley. As a composition it reflected credit on the Signor; it was well conceived, scientifically written, and remarkably pleasing and effective.—Morning Post, May 16, 1833.

Next month we hope to give some further notes on this excellent Exhibition, which, judging from its announced scope, should be largely visited.

DOTTED CROCHET.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

The visitor to picturesque Shrewsbury naturally makes his way to the fine old church of St. Mary, a sacred edifice exhibiting almost every variety of architectural style, from Anglo-Norman of the twelfth century to Perpendicular. Internally its Jesse window and the tomb of Admiral Benbow, and externally its spire, 222 feet in height, are features of interest. But should the wayfarer chance to examine the Registers of Baptisms, he would find the following entry recorded in the month of May, 1726:—

Charles & Sussannah, son & daughter of James and Anne Mackburny, baptiz^d the 5th. Day

The boy-twin became the celebrated historian of music who forms the subject of this Biographical Sketch.

The prefix Mack in the above entry suggests a Scotch ancestry, and tradition lends support to that view. It is said that the family arrived from north of the Tweed with James I. Perchance the Macburneys (this is doubtless the more correct spelling) could even claim descent from Syr Mawburney, mentioned among the Knights at a tournament in Smithfield in the reign of Richard II. But it is sufficient for our purpose to know that, in the second half of the seventeenth century, one James Macburney, a Shropshire country gentleman of good estate, lived at the village of Great Hanwood, near Shrewsbury. This James Macburney—who was land-steward to the Earl of Ashburnham and the lessee, or possessor, of a house at Whitehall—married the daughter of his Shropshire rector. His son—also named James Macburney and the father of our musical Doctor Burney—was born at Great Hanwood in 1678, educated at Westminster School under the famous Dr. Busby, and, taking to art, became a pupil of the 'eminent face painter,' Michael Dahl. Young Macburney however became so attracted by the face of a pretty young actress named Rebecca Ellis, that they arranged a runaway marriage—the bridegroom being nineteen years of age, the bride a fair damsel of sixteen summers. Mr. Macburney senior—who had become a widower—showed his wrathful displeasure at his son's matrimonial escapade in two ways: first, by disinheriting the young man, and secondly, by marrying his own cook! The fat was in the fire truly enough in the Macburneys' domestic circle. James Macburney, junr., had a numerous family by his girl-wife. One of their children, James Burney—at what time the prefix Mac was dispensed with is not known—succeeded Dr. William Hayes in the organistship of St. Mary's Church, Shrewsbury, and held the post for fifty-four years (1732—1786); James Burney was noted for his 'extemporaneous voluntaries in the lighter manner of Handel's organ concertos, on whose admirable school his taste was formed, and the brilliant execution of his finger on the echo stops.' At his death, in 1789, he bequeathed the sum of £60 for the erection of a clock and chimes in the church of which he had been chief musician for upwards of half-a-century.* After the death of his wife, James Macburney, junr., led to the altar a beautiful and rich young lady of Shropshire named Ann Cooper, who is said to have rejected the hand of William Wycherley, the dramatist. By his second wife he had other children, the youngest being the twins, Charles and Susannah, named in the baptismal entry above given.

Charles Burney was born at Raven Street, Shrewsbury, April 12, 1726. As his father, James Macburney, had to support a family of nine children, the surviving members of a progeny of fifteen, he settled as a portrait-painter at Chester, leaving his little son, Charles, to the care of a foster-mother at Conover, a village four miles from Shrewsbury. In course of time the boy rejoined his parents at Chester and became a pupil at the famous King's School of that city founded by King Henry VIII. in 1541. Charles Burney was a King's Scholar from December 25, 1739, to March 25, 1742, on the nomination of Prebendary Prescott, an enthusiastic amateur in music of that time. He was not entered on the roll of the School as MacBurney.† In a letter written to his daughter Fanny, and dated August, 1797, Burney recalls his school days in these words: 'I ran about Chester, the rows, walls, Cathedral, and castle, as familiarly as I could have done fifty years ago; visited the Free School, where I hic, hoec, hoc'd it three or four years; and the Cathedral, where I saw and heard the first organ I ever touched.' Assuming his memory to be reliable, he had not breathed a very musical atmosphere at Conover. Chester therefore opened to him the world of music—an art in which he was to distinguish himself by his industry and literary gifts. He studied under the Cathedral organist, Edmund Baker, a pupil of Dr. Blow and formerly the first organist of St. Chad's Church, Shrewsbury. The boy made sufficient progress to be able to keep the Cathedral organ going while Mr. Baker was hors de combat with an attack of gout. He also received singing lessons from Baker, and made his appearance in public as a singer at a concert. In one of the numerous autobiographical notes in his 'History of Music,' Burney says (vol. iv., p. 299):—

The favour of this air extended into the country, where it was heard with indulgence at a concert fifteen years after its performance; when, without knowing how to construe, or even to pronounce the words, I had been taught to sing it by the organist of Chester, at fourteen years old.

The 'beautiful and always favourite air'—to quote Burney's own words in the text of his History above referred to—was 'Dove sei? amato bene,' from Handel's opera 'Rodelinda,' first performed in London, February 13, 1725, but the lovely melody is best known in association with the words 'Holy, holy.' It was during Burney's pupilage at Chester that, in 1741, Handel visited the city on his way to Dublin, and Master Burney saw him smoke his pipe over a dish of coffee at the Exchange Coffee-House; 'for being extremely curious to see so extraordinary a man,' he records, 'I watched him narrowly as long as he remained in Chester; which, on account of the wind being unfavourable for his embarking, at Parkgate, was several days.' He then tells the oft-repeated story concerning one Janson, printer, Cathedral bass singer, and 'one of the best musicians in the choir' (!) when Handel 'let loose his great bear upon him' [Janson]; and after swearing in four or five languages, cried out in broken English: 'You schautrel! tit not you dell me dat you could sing at soite?'—'Yes, sir,' replied the printer, 'and so I can, but not at first sight!'

An anecdote of Burney's boyhood furnishes a foretaste of that dogged perseverance and unabated enthusiasm for work which characterized him throughout his long life. His ardour for improving his youthful mind by being up with the lark caused him to hit upon a strange device. He tied one end of a ball of string round his big toe and then let the ball drop just within the reach of a labouring boy who, he had arranged, should pull the string on his way to his early morning work.

Upon his return to Shrewsbury, Burney studied music under his half-brother, James Burney, organist of St. Mary's Church, already referred to: but, like all successful men, he neglected not the invaluable aid—that grit-producing quality—of self-help. To quote his own words as recorded in an early memorandum:—

The celebrated Felton, & after him, the first Dr. Hayes, came from Oxford to Shrewsbury on a tour, while I was studying hard, without instruction or example; and they amazed and stimulated me so forcibly by their performance on the organ, as well as by their encouragement, that I

* Madame D'Arblay (Fanny Burney), in the memoirs of her father, Dr. Burney, published in 1732, gives the name of this church as St. Margaret's, instead of St. Mary's. This error has been constantly repeated by various biographers of the Burney family, the latest being the monograph on Fanny Burney in the 'English Men of Letters Series' issued last year. There has never been a church in Shrewsbury dedicated to St. Margaret.

thenceforward went to work with an ambition & fury that would hardly allow me to eat or sleep.

The quantity of music which I copied at this time, of all kinds, was prodigious; & my activity and industry surprised everybody; for, besides writing, teaching, tuning, and playing for my brother, at my momens perdis, I was educating myself in every way I was able. With copy-books, I improved my hand-writing so much, that my father did not believe I wrote my letters to him myself. I tried hard to at least keep up the little Latin I had learned; & I diligently practised both the spinet and violin; which with reading, transcribing music for business, and poetry for pleasure; & attempts at composition, and attention to my brother's affairs, filled up every minute of the longest day.

I had also a great passion for angling; but whenever I could get leisure to pursue that sport, I ran no risk of losing my time if the fish did not bite; for I had always a book in my pocket, which enabled me to wait with patience their pleasure.

Burney was a pupil for the violin and French of 'little Matteis,' son of Nicola Matteis, the eminent violinist. Nicholas Matteis the younger lived at Shrewsbury, where he died about the year 1749.

In 1744 Dr. Arne passed through Chester on his way from Dublin to London. He happened to come across young Burney, then a promising lad of eighteen. The composer of 'Rule, Britannia' was so struck with the youth's abilities that he offered to take him as a pupil for three years. Burney thereupon came to London. He played in Arne's orchestra at Drury Lane Theatre, and fiddled under the conductorship of Handel. He tells us:—'In 1745 I performed in his [Handel's] band, sometimes on the violin and sometimes on the tenor, and by attending the rehearsals, generally at his own house in Lower Brook-street and sometimes at Carlton House [then the residence of the Prince of Wales] I gratified my eager curiosity in seeing and examining the person and manners of so extraordinary a man, as well as hearing him perform on the organ. He was a blunt and peremptory disciplinarian on these occasions, but had a humour and wit in delivering his instructions, and even in chiding and finding fault, that was peculiar to himself, and extremely diverting to all but those on whom his lash was laid.' The young violinist, doubtless at the instigation of Arne, found scope for his creative abilities when he contributed some music to Thompson's 'Alfred,' performed at Drury Lane, March 30, 1745. Two years later he published 'Six Sonatas for two violins and a bass,' dedicated to the Earl of Holderness. In the earlier part of his life this nobleman had manifested a great passion for directing operas and masquerades, and in 1743 the London Opera was under the sole management of himself and Lord Middlesex. This explains the following epigram on his appointment as Secretary of State:—

That secrecy will not prevail
In politics is certain,
Since Holderness, who gets the seals,
Was bred behind the curtain.

Burney then made the acquaintance of Fulke Greville, 'the finest gentleman about town,' who is thus grandiloquently described by Madame D'Arblay: 'His person, tall and well-proportioned, was commanding; his face, features and complexion were striking for masculine beauty; and his air and carriage were noble with conscious dignity.' One day, when trying a new harpsichord at Kirkman's warehouse, Greville expressed a wish to receive instruction from a master in the art of music. Upon asking Kirkman if he knew of 'any young musician who was fit company for a gentleman,' the famous harpsichord-maker replied that he knew many, but (to quote the words of Madame D'Arblay) 'very particularly one member of the harmonic corps who had as much music in his tongue as in his hands, and who was as fit company for a prince as for an orchestra.' This 'one member of the harmonic corps' was, of course, Charles Burney. After various interviews between the young beau and the Shrewsbury lad, Greville secured the services of Burney by cancelling his articles for the sum of three hundred pounds, an amount which the ever-impecunious Arne was doubtless only too glad to receive. The dissipated set into which this new engagement led Burney was a mode of life that, happily for him, did not last very long. Mr. Greville fell in love with the young and lovely Fanny Macartney and eloped with her. At the marriage—a stolen one—young Burney, though the youngest member of the small party, gave the bride away! Not long afterwards Burney himself followed the example of his patron, though in a less clandestine manner. At a dance given at the house of his elder brother in Hatton Garden, he fell in love with a Miss Esther Sleepe, and having severed his connection with Greville he married her. The date and place of the wedding are unknown, but it is certain that Burney, then about twenty-two years of age, had to set about earning his living by teaching, and in obtaining an organist appointment.

The Wren church of St. Dionis Backchurch, Fenchurch Street, no longer exists, having been demolished more than thirty years ago; but on a portion of the ground formerly occupied by the old sanctuary there now stands the Vestry Hall of the parish, a quiet spot in the midst of the roar of London. Through the courtesy of Mr. H. R. Greenhill, Vestry Clerk of St. Dionis Backchurch, we have been permitted to examine the interesting parish records—beautifully written and perfectly preserved—in the apartment above-mentioned, a room oak-panelled and ornamented with some fittings formerly in the church. From these old ecclesiastical records we find that on December 15, 1722, the churchwardens agreed with Renatus Harris, of Bristol, that he should build an organ—the first the church ever had—on certain conditions: e.g. The bellows 'to give wind sufficient to make the chorus plump and bold without any faintings'; the touch to be 'easy and free, and not hard or deep, but such to be entirely to the satisfaction and good liking of Mr. Philip Hart' [the first organist of the church]; and the specified stops 'exactly to imitate the natural tone and sound of those several instruments and the human voice.' Upon its completion, the organ was 'to be submitted to the judgment and determination of the following persons: John Loeillet, William Babell, George Frederick Handel, Dr. William Croft, and Mr. R. Courtiville, all of them Professors and Masters of Music, or the majority of them.' Mr. George Frederick Handel apparently did not form one of the judges, as the certificate of approval—dated June 25, 1724—was signed by Wm Croft, Ra. Courtiville, and John Loeillet. These three gentlemen received the sum of six guineas for their services. The organ was opened on the second Sunday in June, 1724, and on the 15th of that month the Vestry passed for payment the sum of ten guineas for 'singing two anthems' on that occasion, in addition to a payment of ten shillings 'for ringing the bells on opening ye organ.' When Mr. Philip Hart, the first organist, returned thanks to the Vestry upon being appointed to the post, he promised 'to give a constant attendance every Sunday, and also on all such Holydays as the Doctor (!) of the parish should appoint.'

The death, on July 17, 1749, of Hart not only caused a vacancy in the organistship of St. Dionis Backchurch, but led to some lively debates in the Vestry in regard to the appointment of his successor. On July 27, 1749, the Vestry decided that the organist should be paid a salary of £30; that he should be annually chosen; and that his duties should be to play at 'two services on Sunday and on other usual Festivals, and to have no deputy but in case of sickness.' The names of nine candidates for the vacant post appear in this Minute, and they had 'to play, in alphabetical order every Sunday morning and afternoon, beginning July 30.' Thus it will be seen that while the Vestry sought the aid of expert opinion as to the quality of the organ in the church, they relied upon their own unaided judgment in testing the qualifications of the organist. In October, after the nine candidates had had their trial Sundays, the Parish proceeded to the election. Great discussion thereupon arose as to the method of procedure, which turned upon Poll v. Ballot. At the final meeting (October 20, 1749) the debate became so heated that, when the Poll method of election was decided upon, several parishioners withdrew from the Vestry Room in protesting indignation. Thereupon it was—Resolved by the Church Wardens and those Inhabitants who remained in the Vestry Room to open a Poll Book directly, and that the Poll should be finally closed this afternoon at 3 o'clock, and that notice thereof should be given throughout the parish and the Church Wardens proceeded to take the Poll accordingly; but during the time of the Poll Mr. Samuel Gilley delivered in at the table a Paper writing on behalf of himself and the several inhabitants who before withdrew, purporting a protest against the election being carried on in any other manner than by ballot, which Paper writing or protest was not signed by any of the inhabitants.

It may have got abroad that the Hankeys and Fullers—mighty folk in the City and Parish—were strongly furthering the candidature of Charles Burney, and therefore we can imagine Mr. Samuel Gilley, upon hearing the crier shouting 'Poll for organist now on,' rushing off to the Vestry Room in order to defeat the Hankey-pankeys of Burney's supporters, but all to no purpose. Of the seven candidates who went to the poll, Burney headed the list with fifty votes, Gilding (afterwards organist of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street) coming next with only four votes, a Mr. Larkin had one, and the remaining four gentlemen received none.

Turning to less ecclesiastical matters we find that Burney became a member of the Royal Society of Musicians on December 3, 1749, and that he officiated as conductor of the New Concerts, King's Arms, Cornhill, the City being at that time residential as well as commercial. On December 13, 1750, Mendez's 'Robin Hood,' with music by Burney, was produced at Drury Lane, but without success. It was however revived on Boxing Day with the pantomime of 'Queen Mab,' the music of which was published with this title:—

The Comic Tunes in QUEEN MAB as they are perform'd at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane. . . .
Compos'd by the Society of the TEMPLE of APOLLO;
Publish'd by authority.

London: printed for J. Oswald and sold at his Musick Shop in St. Martin's Lane.

These 'Comic Tunes' included such titles as the Night Gown, the Whip, Harlequin in the Dumps, the Sedan Chair, and the Stone-cutter's Yard. The music is said to have been composed by Burney, under the pseudonym of 'The Society of the Temple of Apollo,' but in a later copy of the publication, printed from the same plates and issued by Randall, and by Straight and Skillem, the name of James Oswald is given as the composer.

Burney held the organistship of St. Dionis Backchurch for two and-a-half years only; he relinquished it on account of his health, and upon the advice of Dr. Armstrong, 'the Poet Æsculapius,' he exchanged London life for that of the country. As the Vestry minutes record that he resigned the post at Easter, 1752, this gives us the exact date of Burney's settlement at King's Lynn, whither he went to become organist of St. Margaret's Church in that Norfolk town. All former biographers state that his salary as organist at King's Lynn was £100 (or £120) per annum, a large amount for a country town, in those days at least; but none of them seem to have made inquiry as to the actual facts of the case. We have therefore, through the kindness of Mr. Albert E. Rust, parish clerk of St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn, obtained the following fresh information, extracted from the Vestry records—information which confirms our surmise, viz., that the official salary (of £30 per annum) was augmented by private subscription, whereby the emoluments were increased to the yearly payment of £100, or £120. In proof thereof we print, for the first time, the following letter addressed by Burney to the churchwardens and parishioners of St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn:—

Gentlemen,

High Street, 1st February, 1755.

The Subscription being expired which first induced me to reside in this town, and my success in other respects falling short of my expectations. The organ Salary is too inconsiderable to retain me in your service.

I am therefore obliged to inform you that I shall resign my place of Organist at Michaelmas next, or sooner if you can meet with a person to your satisfaction to succeed me. And here permit me to acquaint you that the fine Instrument in your possession requires great time and pains to keep it in order, ^{fm} the multiplicity of its stops; the chief whereof I can faithfully assure you will soon become useless if neglected in this particular; and give me leave further to add, that the tuning of an Organ is nowhere understood to be of the Person's business who performs upon it, and the less so, as very few Organists are qualified for the undertaking.

I thank you for the honour conferred upon me by my Election

I Remain Gentlemen

Yr most Obedient and most Hble Servant
CH. BURNEY.

At the Easter Vestry of 1755, the comment of the churchwardens on the foregoing letter is recorded in these terms:—

Whereas the present Organist Charles Burney has signified to the Church-wardens and Parishioners by letter of the 1st of February last that he will resign his place of Organist at Michaelmas next or sooner if they can meet with a person to their satisfaction to succeed him.

It is therefore now ordered that an advertisement be inserted in the Daily Advertiser and General Evening Post as often as the Church-wardens think proper, that an Organist is now wanted at the salary of Thirty pounds, and that any person who can come well recommended, is desired to come over and play upon the Organ, and if he be approved of by the Parishioners, he shall be admitted into the office immediately.

It is evident however that some arrangement was made whereby the services of Burney were retained. The churchwardens' accounts show that he was paid the 'usual salary' (£30) up to Michaelmas, 1759, at which time, or soon after, he returned to London.

Upon his arrival at King's Lynn, Burney found the organ 'execrably bad.' Given by John Tinner in 1679, and built by Ralph Dallans, the wooden pipes of this decrepit instrument had become so worm-eaten that they fell to pieces when they were taken out to be cleaned. The churchwardens consulted the famous organ-builder Snetzler—then settled in England—as to the possibility of repairing the old organ. He replied: 'If you were to lay out a hundred pounds upon it, perhaps it would then be worth fifty.' Snetzler was thereupon engaged to build a new instrument at a cost of £700, a large amount in those days. The new organ, completed in the year 1754, gave full satisfaction and greatly added to the fame of its builder. Of full compass,—i.e., 'long octaves'—it consisted of three manuals and thirty stops, including a double diapason of metal on the great organ; moreover, in this his famous Lynn organ Snetzler first introduced the Dulciana stop.

It was at Lynn that Burney first conceived the idea of writing a History of Music. Although he had pupils in and around the town, he found time for those musical-literary pursuits which were the life-blood of his existence during his eight years' residence in Norfolk. Trotting along its sandy, non-turnpiked roads, Burney's mare Peggy would pick her way, while her master studied Italian poetry on her back, with a dictionary of his own compiling in one pocket of his great-coat, and his commonplace-book in the other. At Lynn his two celebrated children were born—Charles, who became the eminent Greek scholar, and Frances (Fanny) the novelist, afterwards Madame D'Arblay. Here too Burney first became acquainted, though only through correspondence, with Dr. Johnson. In 1755 the Dictionary appeared, when Burney, apparently, wrote to Johnson in appreciative terms of that remarkable achievement. In a letter addressed to 'Mr. Burney, in Lynne Regis, Norfolk,' and dated April 8, 1755, the great lexicographer says:

If you imagine that by delaying my answer I intended to show my neglect of the notice with which you have favoured me, you will neither think justly of yourself nor of me. Your civilities were offered with too much elegance not to engage attention; and I have too much pleasure in pleasing men like you not to feel very sensibly the distinction which you have bestowed upon me.

When you have leisure to think again upon me, let me be favoured with another letter; and another yet, when you have looked into my Dictionary. If you find faults, I shall endeavour to mend them; if you find none, I shall think you blinded by kind partiality; but to have made you partial in his favour will very much gratify the ambition of, Sir, Your most obliged,

And most humble servant

SAM JOHNSON.

Nearly three years afterwards Dr. Johnson wrote again on the same subject to his Lynn admirer:—

Gough Square, Dec. 24, 1757.

That I may show myself sensible of your favours, and not commit the same fault a second time, I make haste to answer the letter which I have received this morning.

I remember, with great pleasure, your commendation of my Dictionary. Your praise was welcome, not only because I believe it was sincere, but because praise has been very scarce. A man of your candour will be surprised when I tell you, that among all my acquaintance there were only two who, upon the publication of my book, did not endeavour to depress me with threats of censure from the publick, or with objections learned from those who had learned them from my own preface. Yours is the only letter of good-will that I have received; though, indeed, I am promised something of that sort from Sweden.

I am, &c.

SAM JOHNSON.

We could not leave the Lynn organist in better company than that of Dr. Johnson, whom we shall have to mention again in a further instalment of this biographical sketch.

The portrait of Dr. Burney which forms one of our Special Supplements is from the painting of him by Sir Joshua Reynolds. It is photographed for the first time direct from the original by the kind permission of its present owner, the Ven. Archdeacon Burney, Archdeacon of Kingston and a great-grandson of the historian of music. Sir Joshua painted it in 1781 for Mrs. Thrale, and at the sale of that lady's effects in 1814 the picture was purchased by the Burney family, in whose possession it has since remained.

A FATHER OF MUSIC.

GIACOMO CARISSIMI.

If, as some authorities assert, Carissimi was born in 1604, the Tercentenary of that event falls this year. Be that as it may, so eminent a master deserves to be held in honoured remembrance for his share in the evolution of the art of music.

The biographical information concerning Carissimi is disappointingly meagre. Even the place of his birth, like that of the date of his entry into the world, is not known with certainty. After having held a professional post for some years at Assisi he went to Rome, where he remained for the rest of his long life. He obtained the Mastership of the church of St. Apollinaris, attached to the German College, and faithfully discharged the duties appertaining to that office until his death, which took place on January 12, 1674.

Let us endeavour to substantiate the claim of Carissimi to be considered a Father of Music. All historians of the art, from Kircher of the 17th century to Hubert Parry, unite in placing Carissimi high up in the roll of fame. He contributed largely to the perfection of recitative, in which connection we may quote the words of Sir Hubert Parry as written in his 'The Art of Music':—

In his solo music Carissimi is much more refined and artistic than Monteverde; and though he falls behind him in strength of emotional character, he reaches at times a very high degree of pathos and tenderness, and has a good hold on many varieties of human feeling. The greater part of his solo music is recitative, but it is of a more regular and definite type than that of his predecessors, and often approaches to clear melodic outlines; while there are plenty of examples of solo music in which the reiteration of a characteristic phrase in contrasting and corresponding portions of the scale gives the effect of completeness of design. Thus the art of choral music sprang into new life through the impulse to express dramatic feeling in terms of harmonic design as well as of counterpoint, while solo music gained definition through the same impulse to make it at once expressive and intelligible in form.

Carissimi practically invented the Church Cantata. Here again the Oxford Professor of Music must be quoted ('Oxford History of Music,' vol. iii., 'The Music of the seventeenth century') :—

Of all the composers who aimed at combining musicianship of the old order with the characteristics of the Nuove Musiche, Carissimi stands the most conspicuous. His natural bent seems to have been towards a more serious style than that of his contemporaries, and a large portion of his works were either motets or other forms of church music, or oratorios. This latter form of art had not been cultivated with much success by the composers of the new school. They were not musicians enough to write effective choruses.

Sir Hubert well says that the sympathy of the old master was evidently with the human element in music. To quote further :—

The vigour of Carissimi's artistic instinct evidently led him to realize, that music which is not intended to be associated with stage accessories needs to have certain artistic qualities of its own to justify its existence; and sufficient distinctness of suggestion to define the circumstances which are presupposed in the story, drama, or recital which is musically treated.

Again, how true is the following :—

When music is to be unaided by stage presentation it must justify itself by inherent interest of all kinds, by artistic qualities of design, style and treatment, and by such clear indications of mood and emotion as shall require no accessories or sign-posts to show what is intended. It was the fact that Carissimi gave his mind so much to forms of art which were not intended for stage presentation which made him cultivate musicianship on the lines of the earlier church masters; and it was this also which gave him such pre-eminence as a leader in the direction of tonal form.

It is interesting to note that nearly all the choruses in his [Carissimi's] oratorios have a kind of realistic basis. He evidently felt that some clear indication was needed to give point to the utterances of the human beings composing the chorus, and to identify them with the particular crowd or group of imaginary beings whose parts in the drama or story they had to fulfil. He therefore adopted as frequently as possible a kind of ejaculatory utterance, such as short incisive phrases banded from one group of voices to another. He seems to have tried to conjure up in his imagination the demeanour of a crowd in the situations and circumstances presupposed, and to have tried to make them sing their protests, questions, lamentations, rage, or pleasure in the manner in which many people, moved by a simultaneous impulse, might be expected to do.

If only conductors of all choirs would stimulate their own imagination and that of their singers by endeavouring to obtain the results set forth in the above quotation, how different the standard of our choral singing would be.

Carissimi was a most prolific composer. Although much of his music was destroyed at the time of the suppression of the Jesuits, when the collections of S. Apollinaris and Gesù were sold for waste paper, there still remains an immense quantity, more than sufficient to prove the vastness of his creative output. The libraries of Christ Church, Oxford, the Fitzwilliam, Cambridge, and the British Museum, in this country alone, can bear testimony to the fact that Carissimi was by no means an idle man. Handel had reason to be grateful to him. We know not the full extent of his borrowings from this particular Italian master, but this we do know, that in one short work alone, 'Jephthah' (by Carissimi), Handel, within thirty pages of an octavo printed score, found material for 'Judas,' 'Samson,' and 'Alexander's Feast'! Dr. Crotch, in treating of this matter in his 'Lectures,' and referring to the chorus 'Hear Jacob's God' in 'Samson,' says: 'Several passages in this chorus are pretty exactly copied from Carissimi's chorus, "Plorate filiae" ('Jephthah').* Other composers owe not a little to Carissimi, though the charge of plagiarism cannot be made against them. Our own Purcell is one, and when Dr. Blow heard King Charles II. eulogise Carissimi's dainty duet 'Dite, o Ciel,' the English musician forthwith composed his famous duet 'Go, perjured man.'

Two of Carissimi's oratorios have been published with English words—'Jonah' and 'Jephthah.'

The former was first performed in England at St. James's Hall, March 23, 1872, under the direction of Henry Leslie. 'Jephthah,' however, holds the first place in the interest of its music, and, of course, its subject. This masterpiece was first performed in this country more than half-a-century ago, on May 21, 1851, at St. Martin's Hall, at one of John Hullah's excellent monthly concerts of ancient and modern music. Even the distractions of the Great Exhibition did not cause Hullah to swerve from his artistic purpose in preparing and performing the little oratorio. We have before us the programme of this interesting revival; it states that 'The chorus will consist of the members of Mr. Hullah's first upper singing school,' that 'the orchestra will be complete in every department,' and that the organist on that occasion was 'Mr. Hopkins.' The work was sung to the original Latin version; but in 1873, as one of the illustrations in a course of lectures on the oratorio delivered by Mr. Ernst Pauer, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society, 'Jephthah' was sung in an English version prepared by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck and published by Messrs. Novello.

Finally, no one can read the music of 'Jephthah' without admitting the truth of John Hullah's words that Carissimi must be regarded as the type and glory of the seventeenth century—the Transition period of the art of music. Thus the genius of Carissimi played no inconsiderable part in the evolution of modern music; for this, his name should be kept in memory and his music should secure the attention it deserves, no less for its artistic sincerity than for its intrinsic beauty and depth of feeling.

THE 'DRESDEN AMEN'

IN THE FIRST MOVEMENT OF MENDELSSOHN'S
'REFORMATION' SYMPHONY.

BY DR. ALFRED HEUSS.

(Freely translated and abbreviated, by permission, from the 'Signale'.)

Mendelssohn's 'Reformation' Symphony, though not very frequently performed, is better known in the present day than it was during the lifetime of its composer; at any rate it has within recent years excited interest on account of the introduction into it of the so-called 'Dresden Amen,' which through Wagner's 'Parsifal' has acquired artistic celebrity. Tappert in his interesting article 'Das Gralthema aus Richard Wagner's "Parsifal,"' mentions various works in which it is to be found, and among them, naturally, Mendelssohn's Symphony; but he is startled at coming across it 'suddenly, without any subsequent development,' as 'a short andante-intermezzo in the allegro in D minor'; the intention of Mendelssohn appears to him 'enigmatical.' Now in a serious work we have a right to expect a cause, an artistic consistency, in a purely musical as well as an ideal sense, and if it cannot be thus explained, this introduction of the 'Dresden Amen' must be looked upon as striking but without apparent motive. Before discussing the matter, however briefly, we must say something about the history of the 'Reformation' Symphony.

Not much is known concerning the work. It did not gain firm footing during Mendelssohn's lifetime, for it was only published in 1868 as No. 36 of the posthumous works. Further, Lampadim, on page 98 of his 'F. Mendelssohn' (Leipzig, 1886), informs us that the composer, after he had completed his score, was undecided as to the title he should give it. This was at Weimar in the year 1830, he at that time being twenty-one years old. From there he wrote to his musical sister Fanny that she should gather opinions as to whether he should call it 'Reformation,' 'Confessional' Symphony, or 'Symphony for a Church Festival,' &c. This is not unimportant; from it we may feel sure that not only the last movement, with Luther's chorale, has reference to the Reformation, but we have reason to regard the whole as a Protestant declaration-of-faith Symphony, and more especially, if in the other movements there are passages showing connection with the Reformation. . . .

The first question is: How comes the 'Dresden Amen' in the first movement? Is it there without cause and, in that case, without artistic justification? A confusion may easily arise, seeing that 'this Amen' is regarded as specifically Roman Catholic, and from that point of view would be most unsuitable to this work; for with its ideal, pure colouring, which Mendelssohn has intensified by the clear-sounding key (of D), by placing it in the high register, and by giving the phrase (in the strings) pianissimo at its beginning and ending (see Ex. 1), and further by introducing it amid surroundings of totally different character, it would have represented Catholicism in a manner altogether opposed to his strong, orthodox faith. This was by no means his intention, and it has not even been proved that Mendelssohn became acquainted with the theme at the Dresden Catholic service. Tappert in his article mentions that he himself first heard it as a response in the Evangelical liturgy, and points to its occurrence in the Zittau Choir Book of 1878; and perhaps it was so with Mendelssohn, especially as we have no knowledge of his having sojourned in Dresden. This hypothesis gains ground if the themes which surround this 'Dresden Amen' be submitted to close investigation; moreover, they will also furnish the clue to our 'Amen.' I will return to the general meaning, but meanwhile let me give the 'Amen' in the Mendelssohn form:—

The theme is immediately preceded, in the slow introductory section, by the following phrase given out by full brass; the first half has already been heard sounding through several bars, and thus heralding it—

This theme is nothing but a strong presentation of the 'Dresden Amen,' the auxiliary notes being omitted; at b those quaver notes are also discarded; there remains only the framework, but in impressive form. The theme, however, as at a, is very interesting, and for our contention doubly so, in that it gives clear evidence respecting its origin. Those quaver notes correspond to the crotchets in the 'Dresden Amen' form, and also in the response of the Evangelical liturgy. Tappert quotes from the Zittau Choir Book as follows:—

Ex. 3.

CHOIR.

PREDIGER.

Und mit dei-nem Gei ste

Der Herr sei mit euch

and these repeated a's, freely used by Mendelssohn, show to a certainty that the theme given out by the wind instruments is derived from the 'Dresden Amen'; they were not placed there without intention. But Mendelssohn gives further and important value to his theme. After the 'Dresden Amen' in both forms has twice been sounded, the principal movement, Allegro con fuoco, opens with the following theme—

Ex. 4. Tutti.

f sf

which, if it be compared with the second form of the 'Amen' (2b) as played by the wind instruments, will be found to be the same theme with all intermediate notes removed; here only the characteristic interval of a fifth is retained—but here we have tonic-dominant, not, as in 2b, dominant tonic. During the whole movement this theme plays an important rôle, and it is of special interest in that it assumes new forms, some of which approach nearer to the original form. Mendelssohn evolves his second subject freely from the principal theme, but more like the 'Dresden Amen,' and, further, in the minor key—

Ex. 5.

p sf

Here the theme assumes a different character, the reason for which we shall learn later on.

Again, very instructive and characteristic is a further employment of the principal theme (Ex. 4), repeated on different degrees of the scale and with different orchestration; and here likewise is an approach to the original form—

Ex. 6.

Wood-wind.

mf sf

We have once again the framework of the 'Dresden Amen' before us, only, as in the introduction, broader and more massive. But immediately afterwards Mendelssohn gives us a more striking resemblance to the 'Amen,' for he now carries out the motif (2a), thus—

Ex. 7.

f sf dim.

Various other forms of the chief theme could be shown; this, for instance—

Ex. 8.

Of greater importance, however, is the fact that the middle parts of the 'Amen' are employed in the development section, and, in fact, in inversion—

Ex. 9.

p sf

Mendelssohn in several places uses the downward progression for the formation of melodies, and indeed evolves from them long periods, as for instance at the end of the movement—

Ex. 10.

The middle notes are also used in ascending order, and likewise at the close, whereat the whole thematic material is once again presented in condensed form only and, as in all these variants, in the minor instead of in the major key—

Ex. 11.

These investigations were indeed necessary, because they make one point specially clear: the most weighty thematic material of the whole first movement (including the introductory Andante) is drawn from the theme of the 'Dresden Amen'; it is used, developed, metamorphosed with a variety that is perfectly astonishing; and this alone from a composer's standpoint. In none other of his works has Mendelssohn made such manifold use of a theme, and, what is still more important, no master before Mendelssohn had done so to the same degree; not even Beethoven, who did not attempt similar transformations of a theme. In the technique of this movement, which has something of the leitmotif about it, we see Mendelssohn stretching out his hands directly to Berlioz and Liszt, and artistic grounds can be assigned for his treatment.

In the remainder of his article Herr Heuss argues that the 'Dresden Amen' was certainly not used by Mendelssohn as a Roman Catholic symbol; such a supposition he considers 'impossible.' The words both of the Catholic and Evangelical version ('et cum spiritu tuo' and 'und mit deinem Geiste') clearly explain for him the meaning of its use: it typifies the Spirit of God, the armour with which the struggle of the Reformation, of Protestantism, was to be carried on. Space prevents us from giving the writer's interesting explanation with regard to the twofold appearance of the 'Amen' theme and the struggle after the truth as depicted in the development section. Of the close he notes that the 'wished-for ideal has not been reached; the theme is unable to rise to the dominant, the characteristic interval of the "Dresden Amen." The culminating point Mendelssohn has placed in the last movement in which the Luther chorale brings the whole work to a victorious end.'

* The 'Phantastic' Symphony of Berlioz was certainly unknown to Mendelssohn in the year 1830. Schumann's celebrated notice of the work appeared in 1835.

His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood on Dr. Edward Elgar. Congratulations to Sir Edward upon being the recipient of a distinction which, through him, pays a worthy tribute to music.

Occasional Notes.

Longe have I been a singinge man,
 And sondrie partes ofte I have sunge :
 Yet one parte since I first began
 I colde, nor can singe, olde nor yonge :
 The Meane, I mene, which parte showthe well,
 Above all partes moste to excell.

The Base and Treble are extremes,
 The Tenor standethe sturdelye ;
 The Counter reignethe then, me semes,
 The Meane muste make our melodie :
 Thus is the Meane, who meanthe it well,
 The parte of partes that dothe excell.

Of all our partes, is anye jarre,
 Blame not the Meane, beinge songe trewe :
 The Meane must make it, may not marre,
 Lacking the Meane, oure mirth adewe ;
 Thus showethe the Meane not meanlie well,
 Yet dothe the Meane in this excell.

Marke well the mannour of the Meane,
 And therbie tyme and tune your songe
 Unto the Meane, where all partes leane,
 All partes are kepte from singing wronge :
 Though the singinge men take this not well,
 Yet dothe the Meane in this excell.

The Meane in compasse is so large,
 That everye parte must joyne therto ;
 It hath an ouer in everie barge,
 To saye, to singe, to thinke, to do :
 Of all thes partes no partes dothe well
 Without the Meane, which dothe excell.

To highe, to lowe, to lowde, to softe,
 To fewe, to manie at a parte alone ;
 The Meane is more melodious
 Than any partes lacking that one :
 Wherbie the Meane comparethe well,
 Among all partes most to excell.

The Meane in losse, the Meane in gaine,
 In wealth, or in adversitie ;
 The Meane in healt he, the Meane in paine,
 The Meane meanethe alwaies equitie :
 The Meane thus ment may meane full well,
 Of all other partes most to excell.

To me and myne, with all the reste,
 Good Lorde graunte grace, with hartie voice,
 To singe the Meane, that meanethe best
 All partes in the beste for to reioyse :
 Which Meane in meaninge meanethe well,
 The Meane of Meanes that dothe excell.

The Mendelssohn Scholarship, of the value of £100 per annum, and one of the most important of its kind, has recently been competed for, the successful competitor being Mr. George Dyson, of Charlton, Kent. The new Scholar received his musical education at the Royal College of Music, where he studied under Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Frederick Bridge, Mr. W. S. Hoyte, and Mr. Franklin Taylor. The scholarship is awarded for one year only, but is renewable for a further period, not exceeding four years in all, at the discretion of the committee. The education of the Scholar is carried on, in this country or abroad, under the control of the Mendelssohn Scholarship Committee, of which Mr. J. Edward Street is the Honorary Secretary.

The London Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert on June 9, at Queen's Hall, under the experienced direction of Dr. Hans Richter, who generously consented to conduct on that initial occasion. Of the ninety-nine members forming this new and important organization, forty-six have recently seceded from the Queen's Hall Orchestra, while thirty-two others formerly played under Mr. Wood's baton. The reasons which have led these picked players to form a co-operative orchestra are not of public interest. Suffice it to say that they will manage their own affairs (through a committee), and appoint their own conductor—thus following the example of the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras; they will accept engagements, either to the full strength of the orchestra, or in smaller contingents, in varying numbers, from forty upwards. We understand that it is the intention of the London Symphony Orchestra to invite some of the greatest conductors of Europe to direct their concerts. To return to the inaugural music-making. The programme consisted of the following masterpieces:—

OVERTURE	...	Meistersinger	...	...	Wagner.
SUITE IN D	...	...	...	...	Bach.
OVERTURE	...	Zauberflöte	...	...	Mozart.
SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS	...	...	...	...	Elgar.
HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY IN F	...	...	...	...	Liszt.
SYMPHONY IN C minor (No. 5)	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.

Magnificent indeed was the interpretative excellence of this representative programme. Every man seemed to be on his mettle,—strings as well as brass—and the result was not only a triumph for all concerned, but a good augury for the success of a venture that will be watched with sympathetic interest.

'The Angelina Goetz Library' is a large collection of music which has recently been presented to the Royal Academy of Music by the children of the late Mrs. Goetz as a memorial of that accomplished lady and lover of music. The total number of volumes (339) gives little idea of the extent of this munificent gift, but a few details may help towards estimating its value and usefulness:—

Operas in full score, of which thirteen are by Auber	91 Volumes.
Orchestral works in full score	107 "
Mozart's works (complete)	53 "
Schubert's ditto	32 "
Schumann's ditto	25 "
&c., &c.

To add to the completeness of this benefaction an excellent catalogue (folio, 224 pages) of 'The Angelina Goetz Library' has been compiled by Mr. A. Rosenkranz, who has discharged his task with a thoroughness born of enthusiasm and long experience. The catalogue is arranged in two sections:—

Part I.—A list of the volumes in numerical order.

Part II.—A list of the works in classified order.

In the latter section Mr. Rosenkranz has added, wherever known, the date of composition, of first performance, and publication of each work; moreover, he has also supplied an Appendix (40 pages) consisting of an 'Alphabetical table of the names of the composers with short Biographical Notes, a general summary of their compositions, writings, and their bibliography.' Therefore, as a book of reference it is difficult to over-estimate the value of this admirable and carefully-compiled catalogue. It only remains to be said that Mr. Joseph Bennett, as an old friend of the late Mrs. Goetz, contributes to this catalogue a Preface written, it need hardly be said, in terms that are both appreciative and graceful.

We are all proud of our premier choir trainer, Dr. Henry Coward, and would fain believe that he is unique in his infectious enthusiasm and the tremendous amount of time and trouble he takes over rehearsing a difficult choral work. But he seems to have a rival in Professor Siegfried Ochs, conductor of the Philharmonic Choir of Berlin. On one occasion Professor Ochs held no fewer than 117 chorus rehearsals for Beethoven's Mass in D before he was satisfied. Assuming the intelligence and natural aptitude among the Berlin and Sheffield singers to be about equal, we should think that Herr Ochs's performance of the gigantic work must have been a truly memorable one. Perhaps some wealthy 'friend of music' will arrange to provide the funds for a friendly tournament of song, at which the Berlin Philharmonic Choir and one or two of our finest choirs could compete for the proud position of 'First choir in the world.'

In reference to the performance of the said Mass by the Sheffield chorus at the recent Kruse Festival under Herr Felix Weingartner, our special correspondent expressed to Professor Ochs his intense disappointment with the effect produced in those fugal movements such as the 'In gloria Dei patris,' where the bass trombones start the subject ff ben marcato with the choral basses, the tenor trombone follows ff with the choral tenors, the alto trombone with the contraltos, and so on in similar stereotyped fashion almost, whenever a loud fugato is started. In such passages the trombones not only fail to 'mix' with the choral tone, but absolutely ruin the splendid effect which the rolling masses of vocal sound could produce without such well-meant but crude help. Even the staunchest purist cannot pretend that Beethoven's use of the trombones under such conditions is a specimen of matchless orchestral scoring. It is anything but that. If the choral parts are sung with the accuracy and the splendid tone of the Sheffield stalwarts, the doubling brass seems an insult to singers who need no such rude crutches to cover the ground. Moreover it is an annoyance to the listener, who feels that this trombonic doubling of the vocal part interferes with and utterly destroys his enjoyment of that much superior instrument, the human voice. Similar instances in other works will naturally occur, e.g. in the 'Rex tremendæ,' 'Confutatis,' and 'Quam olim abrahæ' of Mozart's Requiem. (We are aware that the trombone parts in these movements are Süssmayer's!) At such points a chorus singer feels inclined to argue: If my voice is to be drowned by these blatant trombones, what is the use of my singing?

This is true enough, and suggests the question: What would Beethoven or Mozart have done, if they could have relied upon choruses as large and competent as those to which we are accustomed? We venture to think that they would have altered their scores in this respect. There cannot be the least doubt that the old masters' crude use of the trombones in such passages was merely a safe way of backing up a small, weak, and more or less incapable chorus. The necessity for such an expedient has passed, and it seems that in performances by really competent choirs the time has come when the spirit of the composer should be considered and the letter slightly 'corrected.' The works would shine with greater beauty, but the design of the movements would in no way be spoiled, because the trombones in their turn are generally 'doubled' by lower strings and organ, which do blend with the human voice. What is the view of our leading conductors on this important subject? In the meantime Professor Ochs has taken the bull by the horns and omitted the trombones!

The following letter, written by a genuine British working-man, has recently found its way into our letter-box:—

SIR,

Will you answer me one question, if you please. Is there any limit to age for trying to pass an examination. I am fifty. I would very much like to try. I will tell you for why. There are some hundreds of people in this town who are in their way very clever, but (ah) when the test come it is nothing but Humbug. I have been in a few Bands so called, and if you ask a question on anything that crop up, it is far from being correct, in fact they know nothing about it, and yet they have the cheek to call themselves Bandmasters—I call them Wagsticks. Just fancy, I was in one Band and the Boss was as deaf as a stone wall and yet they were quite contented. Blasting away like thunder every night we met, it used to take me three days to know if I had a head or not.

If you will give me a hint as to how to go in for it, should be very much obliged indeed.

'Wagsticks' is good.

The Vienna Male-voice Choir were certain of a cordial reception at the concert they gave in St. James's Hall on June 20. It was perhaps unfortunate that the date of their visit clashed with other important musical doings, but, notwithstanding this competition for attention, a numerous and well-disposed audience attended and heartily welcomed the Austrian choralists. It was interesting to compare the tone and execution of this somewhat celebrated choir, which we understand is composed of Viennese railway officials, with that of British male-voice choirs. It may be said at once that the Viennese choralists had no reason to shrink from the comparison, for it was soon evident that they were a highly-trained body of singers. Their voices are tuneful if never richly resonant, and their choral technique is often excellent. Now and then the tone was somewhat rough and therefore not blendful, but more often it was highly agreeable. The rhythmic attack was generally prompt and clean, and in many ways the drill and discipline of a clever conductor, or 'quoir-master' as the programme described Mr. Edmund Reim, were exhibited. The programme had variety: there was the gravity of the 'Teutons' march to battle, a long and not particularly interesting piece by Anton Bruckner, and the ad captandum gaiety of 'The Beautiful Blue Danube' waltz by Johann Strauss. It was a novelty to hear Schubert's female-voice piece 'The Lord is my Shepherd' sung by the male voices an octave lower. We cannot say that we liked the innovation, although it must be admitted that the Viennese Choir sang the piece with excellent tone, expression, and exact intonation. One of the most effective pieces they produced was 'To-day is to-day' (Max v. Weirziel). The execution of the choir here was simply splendid, and the audience was roused to an insistent encore. Another piece very charmingly sung, although perhaps overdone, as other pieces were by the too frequent bulging of crescendos, was 'Many as the stars that twinkle' ('So viel Stern am Himmel stehen') by E. S. Engelsberg. The blend of tone here was beautiful, and the tenderness and expressiveness of the pianissimo were quite touching. Violin solos were well played by Mr. Francis Macmillen, and Mr. Hugo Heinz sang several songs with considerable effect. It was perhaps a pity that some of our metropolitan male-voice choirs could not have met and have formally welcomed the Vienna Choir. But we trust that all the same our visitors will retain kindly recollections of their sojourn and reception in our concert-surfeited metropolis.

This has been a season of prodigies, all of them of the violinist species. But even a star-shower of these short-frocked and knickerbockered little wonders is no new thing. Now they appear one at a time, in order that one may not eclipse another, but about a century-and-a-half ago three of them constellated all at once. If we turn to the Public Advertiser of April 23, 1760, we shall there find the following advertisement:—

By Particular Desire.

Tickets to be had at Arthur's, St. James's Street; at Mr. Walsh's music-shop, Catherine Street; at Mr. Johnson's music-shop, Cheapside, and at the Theatre; where Ladies are desired to send their servants to keep places.

The juvenile harpsichordist in the above prodigious trio was 'Hettie' (Esther), the eldest daughter of Dr. Burney. Miss Schmelling, then nine years of age, subsequently forsook performing on the violin because it was considered to be 'an unfeminine instrument'; but, as Madame Mara, she became a very distinguished singer and died at the age of eighty-four. Master Cervetto was the son of the centenarian 'cellist, and, like his father, became famous as a performer on that instrument. Master Barron seems to have had an appropriate name, judging by the lack of information concerning him and his subsequent career.

Among the multifarious documents which have reached us during the past month is a baker's bag, a receptacle which bears traces of having contained an abundance of buns. On the back of this bunless bag is printed a strain of music adapted to these words:—

Tell me not in mournful numbers
Life is but an empty dream,
Indigestion ne'er encumbers
Those who live on — the last word of the poetry being some particular kind of movable dough product. But why should the quatrain—we had almost written quatern—commence with such doleful suggestiveness? Far more appropriate, and certainly more appetising, would be the words: 'Tell me where is fancy bred.'

The subjoined extract, from a London newspaper, is the concluding sentence of a leading article that is misleading, so far as concerns the information therein contained:—

The soldier and sailor have good authority for their calling, for there is no more thrilling song than that in the oratorio 'Elijah,' which reads, 'The Lord is a man of war.'

Herr General-Musikdirektor Fritz Steinbach was born in 1855 at Grünsfeld in Baden. After studying for several years at the Leipzig Conservatoire—where he gained the Mozart Prize—he became a pupil of Nottebohm at Vienna. 'To him I owe almost everything,' says Herr Steinbach, as with evident delight he recalls the happy time spent with the famous Beethoven scholar and contrapuntist, and especially the hours of recreation when, after lessons were over, the teacher would introduce his eager pupil into the deep and fascinating mysteries of the Beethoven Sketch Books, which Nottebohm was the first to fathom and describe. Young Steinbach displayed unmistakable talent for composition, but like his great colleague, Hans Richter, he soon abandoned creative for interpretative art. In 1880 he was appointed conductor at the Mainz Municipal Theatre, a post he held with distinction till 1886, when he followed a call to Meiningen, to become Court Conductor in succession to Hans von Bülow. It was in this capacity that he laid the solid foundation of his fame as a conductor of the works of the classics, and more especially of Brahms. He had made the acquaintance of Brahms some time previously, for it was he who had recommended Steinbach to Nottebohm. The close friendship between the great master and the young conductor continued to the end of Brahms's life. Not a year passed without their meeting. In the summer Steinbach would visit his revered friend at Vienna or at Ischl, and every winter Brahms travelled to Meiningen to hear the Court orchestra discourse Bach for his special delectation. Thus we may assume that Steinbach's peculiarly unconventional readings, so full of life and feeling, of Brahms's Symphonies and other works must have had the composer's fullest approval. Herr Steinbach's title of General-Musikdirektor was given to him by the art-loving Grand Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, to clothe his 'Hof-Kapellmeister' in the requisite authority for amassing and commanding all available musical forces in the little Grand-Duchy for the purpose of great musical Festivals. On the death of Franz Wüllner last year, the subject of this sketch was appointed successor to that remarkable man as the head of the Cologne Conservatoire and conductor to the Municipality of the famous city on the Rhine.

A lady has been lecturing in New York on the influence of music. In the course of her remarks the fair lecturer asserted that 'certain kinds of music prevent the hair from falling out, and other kinds produce baldness.' She further told her audience that 'those who play their own compositions on the piano preserve, and often acquire, a luxuriant growth of hair,' and in the direction of further enlightenment on this hair, or hairless portion of her discourse, that 'the violoncello and harp have also a tendency to preserve the hair; but wind instruments, especially the trombone and cornet, are fatal to hirsute adornment.' We are further told that at the close of the paper several professional musicians stated that the lecturer's deductions—especially the baldness due to certain deductions of hair—coincided with their own observations. It is therefore evident that a composer who wishes to preserve the natural covering of his pericranium should either keep up his pianoforte playing or else assiduously practise the violoncello or harp. To become a trombonist, or cornettist, would seem to be a somewhat barbarous line of action resulting in a loss of hair.

Congratulations to Mr. S. S. Stratton, of Birmingham, on the splendid success of his son, Mr. Frederick J. M. Stratton, in having come out Third Wrangler in the recent Mathematical Tripos at Cambridge. Like Mr. Ernest Coward, son of Dr. Coward, of Sheffield, —whom last year we felicitated on being placed among the Wranglers—young Mr. Stratton is a Caius man, a College with a suggestion of music about its name. Be this as it may, it is exceedingly pleasant to record such honours obtained by the sons of highly-esteemed musicians. May they uphold the good name of their fathers, and meet with all the success their merits deserve.

Mr. Donald Francis Tovey lectured on June 14 at the Musical Association on the subject of 'Permanent Musical Criteria.' The following is a synopsis of his discourse:—

The individual work of art a microcosm.—Unsoundness of abstract and a priori reasoning about Art as a kind of general science.—True artistic laws always concrete, and applicable to more than one work of art only because of similarity of material.—Principles of organic unity the only universal artistic laws.—Applications of these principles to music, e.g., the laws of part-writing deduced from organization of various types of music, choral and instrumental, showing identities of principle beneath diametrically opposite results in different cases.—Relation between organic laws and historic progress.—Different and opposite meanings of term "progress" as shown in Monteverde, Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, and Wagner.—Classification of composers according to their grasp of organizing principles.

The Meeting was held at 11, Chandos Street, Cavendish Square.

Church and Organ Music.

A VERY ACCOMMODATING VOLUNTARY.

Mr. Joseph Dale (1750-1821) was a very prominent publisher of music in his day. He commenced his commercial career at a private house in Chancery Lane prior to the year 1778. Mr. Frank Kidson, in his 'British Music Publishers,' tells us that one of Dale's catalogues contains a note to the following effect:—

As it is reported that Mr. Dale thinks it troublesome (as he does not keep a shop) to supply those who are not of the trade with books, he begs to say that this is not the case.

He subsequently removed to business premises in Oxford Street, having purchased the stock-in-trade of a Mr. Babb, which included a musical circulating library 'consisting of one hundred thousand books and upwards!' The British Museum Music Catalogue testifies to the industry of Mr. Dale as a composer, there being upwards of seventy entries under his name of pianoforte pieces alone, including two concertos for that instrument. Besides being a prosperous publisher and a considerable composer, Mr. Dale was no ordinary organist. In this capacity he officiated at the church of St. Anthony and St. John-the-Baptist, Watling Street. What more natural, therefore, than that he should direct the stream—if not the torrent—of his creative commodities in the direction of the king of instruments? This he did in his Opera XI., a set of 'Thirty Organ Pieces.' In the course of his ecclesiastical experiences, Mr. Dale doubtless encountered the hill of difficulty associated with the blower. This he met, somewhat ingeniously it must be admitted, in No. 1 of the aforesaid 'Thirty pieces,' to which he prefixed the following information:—

In case of no Blower, the Organist may put down the Bellows himself and Play this No. 1 for a Voluntary upon the Stop Diapason.

Here is this very accommodating Voluntary:—

No. 1. Moderato.

Perhaps some of our readers may like to put Mr. Joseph Dale's composition to the test.

A SWISS ORGAN.

At the pretty English Church of St. Mark, Lucerne—known as the Queen Victoria Jubilee Memorial Church—the erection of a new and adequate organ has supplied a long-felt want. The instrument was opened on May 26 by Professor F. J. Breitenbach, the gifted organist of Lucerne Cathedral, who gave a masterly rendering of various organ solos. The organ is a fine example of Swiss organ-building, and reflects the utmost credit upon the skilful workmanship of its builders, Messrs. Coll and Co., Lucerne.

The disposition of the instrument is unusual in that it is thus divided: Great in the north transept; Choir in the south transept; while the Swell and Pedal organs are placed at the west end of the church on either side of the window. The last-named sections stand at a distance of over 140 feet from the console, each being bracketed high up on the walls. The three reservoirs are placed in the roof of the church, while the main bellows (located in the tower) is blown by an electric motor. The pneumatic tubing, over seven miles in length, passes under the floor of the church and connects the soundboards with the console, which is situated in the south transept. The voicing of the reeds and gambas is characteristic and subdued, while the fluework is of rich and pleasing quality. The diapasons lack perhaps the roundness and strength associated with English work, otherwise the 'timbre' is excellent. The following is the specification, drawn up by the organist of the Church, Mr. S. H. March:—

GREAT ORGAN (6 Stops), IN NORTH TRANSEPT.

	Feet.		Feet.
Open Diapason	8	Fugara	4
Stop Diapason	8	Hohl Flöte	4

CHOIR ORGAN (5 Stops), IN SOUTH TRANSEPT.

SWELL ORGAN (8 Stops), AT THE WEST END OF THE CHURCH.

Horn Diapason	8	Flute Harmonic	4
Lieblieh Gedacht	8	Principal	4
Aeoline	8	Hautbois	8
Voix Celestes	8	Cornopean	8

PEDAL ORGAN (3 Stops), AT THE WEST END OF THE CHURCH.

Violin Diapason	16

COUPLERS.

ACCESSORIES.

Tremulant to Choir. Tremulant to Swell. 4 combination pistons to each organ. Free combination and sforzando pedal. Balanced swell pedal.

The action is tubular-pneumatic throughout. The sound-boards are connected with the console by more than seven miles of pneumatic tubing. The three wind reservoirs are placed in the roof of the church, and the main bellows, located in the tower, is supplied with three feeders and actuated by an electric motor.

THE NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

The sixteenth annual Festival was held on June 4 as heretofore at the Crystal Palace, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Minshall. The programme of the great concert—in which 4,000 singers took part—followed the usual lines of a mixture of sacred and secular choral compositions. These were interspersed with vocal solos contributed by Miss Stanley Lucas and Mr. Alexander Tucker, an organ solo by Mr. Fountain Meen, and selections performed by the orchestra of the Union conducted by Mr. T. R. Croger, who also holds the office of Hon. Secretary of the entire organization. In the morning a choir competition took place, the successful competitors in Class A being the Florence Road Choir, Brighton, conducted by a lady, Miss Bessie Wood; and in Class B by the Park Road choir, Rusden, conductor, Mr. Joseph Farey. A new sacred cantata entitled 'The Prince of Life,' composed by Mr. Arthur Berridge, was also sung (in the concert-hall) by a choir of 200 voices. Miss Jessie Wood and Miss May Wilby were the solo vocalists in an ambitious work which evidently met with the approval of the audience.

WILLIAM HENRY LONGHURST.

The veteran and well-known organist bearing the above name died, we regret to record, at his residence, Harbledown, Canterbury, on June 17, aged eighty-four years. Born at Lambeth on October 6, 1819, he, as an infant of two years was taken to Canterbury where his parents then settled. Soon after his eighth birthday the boy entered the Cathedral choir, the solo boy at that time being George Job Elvey, afterwards of Windsor. So industrious and painstaking was young Longhurst that, when he was only sixteen years of age, the Dean and Chapter appointed him assistant-organist and teacher of the choristers. He held this subordinate post and that of lay-clerk for thirty-seven years, till January 26, 1873, when, on the death of Mr. T. E. Jones, he became organist of the Cathedral, a post he held till 1898, when he retired from active duty. Therefore Dr. Longhurst was actively connected with the music of Canterbury Cathedral—as chorister, assistant-organist, and organist—for the long period of seventy years! He was one of the earliest Fellows of the Royal College of Organists, and in 1875 he received from the Archbishop of Canterbury the degree of Doctor of Music. Dr. Longhurst composed an oratorio (MS.) on the subject of David and Absalom, in addition to anthems, services, glees, &c., and a cantata for female voices entitled 'The Village Fair.' It may not be without interest to mention that when Dr. Longhurst's father added 'German pedals' to the Canterbury organ in 1825 or 1826,—probably the first of their kind in Kent—Master Longhurst was made to crawl into one of the largest pipes and therein sing a little song. It is not every Cathedral organist who could say that he had so voiced one of his organ pipes, or that he had transformed a 'pedal open' into a vox humana.

The death of Dr. Longhurst will not create a vacancy in the organistship of Canterbury Cathedral, as Dr. H. C. Perin was appointed to that office in 1898.

CHURCH MUSIC IN THE FEN COUNTRY.

At Ely Cathedral, on June 7, a choral Festival of parish choirs was held under the auspices of the Ely Diocesan Council of Church Music. The united choirs, which numbered 800 voices, were accompanied by an orchestra of 100 performers, the combination of vocal and instrumental forces producing a veritable pæan of sacred song. The music included an effective processional hymn, composed by Dr. A. W. Wilson, organist of the Cathedral, Barnby's Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E flat (the verse parts sung by the Ely Cathedral choir); while the anthems (three in number) were Garrett's 'It shall come to pass,' Sullivan's 'O love the Lord' (unaccompanied), and a selection from Mendelssohn's oratorio 'Christus.' Dr. E. W. Naylor had composed two orchestral pieces specially for the occasion, entitled a Religioso and a Marche Pontificale, and Mr. F. W. Morley conducted a Festival that was crowned with success.

At the services in King's College Chapel, Cambridge, on Sunday, June 12, the music was of a special nature. In the morning the Te Deum and Benedictus were sung to Garrett in E flat, and at the afternoon service the Canticles were sung to the same composer's setting in B flat. The anthem was 'Sing to the Lord,' by Smart, the fine bass solo being taken by Mr. Potter, one of the choral scholars of the choir, and the rendering of the choruses by the full choir showed the careful training they had received at the hands of Dr. Mann. The voluntaries were brilliantly played by Dr. Mann, that in the afternoon being Mendelssohn's First Sonata. The seating accommodation of the fine old building was taxed to the utmost.

'The ideal of a Cathedral choir' is the title of a thoughtful paper read by Mr. John B. Lott, organist of Lichfield Cathedral, at the Lichfield Cathedral Past-Choristers' Reunion on May 26. As a means towards the attainment of 'The ideal of the Cathedral choir,' Mr. Lott suggested the following motto: As musicians, cultivate skill and reverence; as men, exercise mutual forbearance and kindness. As the organist of Lichfield Cathedral truly said, this 'motto' is suitable for all 'Musical-Ministers.'

St. Asaph Diocesan Choral Festival was held on June 2 in the Cathedral, when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm ('As the hart pants') was sung by the united choirs numbering upwards of a thousand voices. The solos were sung by the Cathedral choir, and a small band, with the organ, furnished the accompaniments. Dr. Kendrick Pyne, organist of Manchester Cathedral, was at the organ, and Mr. W. E. Belcher, Cathedral organist, conducted.

The thirty-fourth Annual Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on June 9. The processional hymns were 'Lord, we love the habitation,' to the melody of 'Tibi Christi, splendor Patris,' 'Lift we now our hearts,' set to music by Dr. C. W. Pearce, and 'Father of Souls' set by Mr. Arthur Henry Brown. Tallis's responses were sung to strict Plain-song, and the anthem was Gounod's 'Sing praises unto the Lord.' Dr. Warwick Jordan presided at the organ.

The following papers on Church Music are announced to be read at the Church Congress to be held in Liverpool during October next:—

(a) The Congregation and the Choir Dr. H. Walford Davies and the Rev. C. H.

Hylton Stewart.

(b) The Music of the Services—

Chanting Dr. A. M. Richardson.
Hymn-singing ... Dr. Basil Harwood.
Services and Anthems Dr. Varley Roberts.

During the absence of Mr. Alfred Hollins in Australia his gifted young pupil, Miss Gladys Dewar, is taking the services at St. George's United Free Church, Edinburgh, and is winning golden opinions by the efficient discharge of her deputy duties.

Mr. J. H. Maunder's sacred cantata 'Olivet to Calvary' was admirably performed at the Presbyterian Church of England, Elliston Street, Jarrow, on June 12, under the direction of the organist of the church, Mr. R. Oliver Elwen.

'The Methodist Hymn Book' has now been issued. We hope to notice this important contribution to Wesleyan service-music next month.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.*

Johannes Brahms! The man's name is like his music, broadly euphonious, strong and dignified. A composer with such a name could not produce trivialities. If one only thinks the matter over, is there not a certain close connection between composers' names and their music? Could the bearer of that weightiest, noblest, greatest name in music, Johann Sebastian Bach, have provided 'additional numbers' for 'musical comedies' if he had lived in London in the twentieth century? Imagination boggles at the thought. The units of Hans von Bülow's musical trinity—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—are pretty accurately summed up in the stern and noble names which they bore.

Herr Kalbeck's great biography of Brahms—of which the first volume of 500 pages has recently been published—bids fair to become another addition to the series of exhaustive biographical and critical works for which German writers are noted. We shall be disappointed if it does not eventually prove as valuable in its way as Spitta's 'Bach,' Pohl's 'Haydn,' Jahn's 'Mozart,' and Niecks's 'Chopin.' Our author possesses many of the qualifications required for his task—his enthusiasm is unbounded; his knowledge seems more than adequate; his love of painstaking research is quite touching, and his candour might be embarrassing were it not so refreshing. That he is a partisan goes without saying. Admirers of Liszt and his devotees, and lovers of programme-music generally, may wince under the terrific strokes of Herr Kalbeck's two-edged sword when he goes forth to do doughty deeds for his hero's greater glory. Good hater of programme-music à la Liszt though he be, he never wearies of reading meanings and programmes into Brahms's own sonatas, serenades, and quartets, while on the other hand he knows how to distinguish between Liszt the composer, for whom he has no affection, and Liszt the noble, captivating man and undisputed king of pianists. Taken as a whole, and making allowance for our author's bias and occasional indiscretions, the book is of great value and uncommon interest. The Lehrjahre and Wanderjahre of the young lion-hearted and lion-maned genius are described in great detail and with fascinating newness of information. The 'blond Johannes' is shown to us as a lovable creature. Much is already known of Brahms the man and master, and nothing but what redounds to his credit. The child in his case was the father of the man. Greatly as the man's sterling character has been admired, it is impossible, after reading Herr Kalbeck's volume, not to feel similar admiration for the youth.

* Johannes Brahms: Max Kalbeck. Erster Band, 1833-1862. Wiener Verlag, Wien und Leipzig. London: Breitkopf and Härtel.

Biographies have hitherto been all but silent regarding Brahms's mother—born Johanna Henrika Christiane Nissen. We now learn that she was the senior of her husband by no less than seventeen years, having been born in Hamburg in 1789; that with her married sister she kept a small shop—a so-called 'Dutch warehouse'—in the Ulrikus Street, Hamburg, where buttons, needles, thread, and linen goods were sold to the 'ladies' of the lowly neighbourhood. Christiane was not blessed with good looks, a pair of beautiful, soulful blue eyes excepted. A weakling from her childhood, she was compelled, as the result of disease, to limp through life. But within her frail body there dwelt a sturdy soul and a strong character. She not only supervised the household arrangements of the 'establishment,' but undertook the responsibility of looking after some rooms on an upper floor, let out to 'single gentlemen.' Hither came one Johann Jakob Brahms (born June 1, 1806, in Heide), a flügelhorn player in the Hamburg Civil Militia, in quest of board and lodging. He was made very comfortable, learnt to admire the blue-eyed, sweet-natured Christiane's womanly qualities, and committed a foolishness which, to quote our author, eventually turned out to have been a stroke of genius—the militia musician married Christiane on June 9, 1830. When a daughter was born to them, the little household quitted the shop in the Ulrikus Street and moved into the Bäckerbreitergang; but this abode proving too expensive, papa Brahms had to content himself with three small rooms in one of the darkest, narrowest lanes in one of the lowest, dirtiest quarters of the old Hansa town. Here, on May 7, 1833, near the haunts of thieves and vagabonds, in a room compared with which Beethoven's humble birthplace in Bonn seems an airy, comfortable hostel, the genius was born who has brought greater and deeper happiness into the lives of the genuine Brahms-lovers who know how to appreciate him, than almost any other composer, Bach and Beethoven perhaps excepted. The rooms actually occupied by the Brahms family cannot unfortunately be ascertained. The great master himself used to point to the left tenement on the first floor of the ramshackle abode in the midst of misery, and the testimony of contemporary dwellers in the house seems to confirm his view. However, as all the floors in the building are similarly divided into three-roomed tenements, Herr Kalbeck hesitates to accept these suggestions and rumours for facts.

Frau Brahms, we learn, was gifted with a remarkable memory, which enabled her even in her old age to learn by heart the whole of Schiller's poems. She was devoted to poetry, quick-witted and inventive, her hobby taking the form of designing original patterns for needlework; she was an adept at making the finest embroideries, and generally she seems to have been superior in intelligence to her young husband. There can be no doubt that it was from her the little 'Hannes' (as he was called at home) inherited his great qualities of heart and mind. Hannes was a puny child, though he was spared all the usual ills that children are heirs to. Up to the age of fourteen he was however afflicted with nervous headaches that tortured him for hours and days together. In after years he could boast that he had never had a day's real illness throughout his life. At the age of ten he was run over by a cab, when he narrowly escaped being killed, one of the wheels going over his chest. For six weeks he was an invalid.

As a little child he was shy and highly strung. A barefooted street-arab himself, he rarely joined his fellow street-gutterites at play, though he is said to have listened with rapt interest and delight to the songs with which they accompanied their games. He would neglect his favourite toys—tin soldiers fascinated him especially, even in after life—and quit the most engrossing game directly he heard his father practise one of the numerous instruments of which that worthysire was more or less master,* and he remembered without difficulty any scraps of tune that came his way. Papa Brahms could not afford the luxury of a pianoforte; moreover, he had a bandsman's contempt for all 'mechanical' instruments. Little Hannes, on the other hand, displayed such a hankering after the keyboard that his father reluctantly took him to the house of a colleague who owned the coveted instrument. The boy soon convinced his papa that there was no need to teach him the notes. Looking away from the keyboard and out of the window, he named correctly any note that was sounded, so that his astonished father threatened him with dire punishment for merely 'guessing.' The little man had invented a system of notation of his own before he knew that such a thing existed!

Herr Kalbeck gives interesting particulars about the boy's first teacher, Otto Friedrich Willibald Cossel, and reproduces in facsimile the earliest known example of Brahms's writing. This is a New Year's letter in which the eight-year-old 'dutiful pupil' sends his 'beloved teacher' good wishes for 1842, thanks him for his kindness in getting him on so well in music, apologises for occasional laxity, and promises to do better in future.

It seems that we have to thank Cossel for frustrating a project which might have completely ruined the career of the budding genius. After the lad had created a sensation, at a concert in 1843, by playing a difficult pianoforte Study by Herz and joining his father and colleagues in Beethoven's Wind Sextet, an enterprising concert agent proposed taking the prodigy on tour to America. Not unnaturally the boy's parents greedily swallowed the golden bait that was dangled before their eyes, and it cost Cossel a great and real sacrifice to avert what he knew to be the worst possible danger that could threaten his gifted pupil's future. He decided reluctantly to part with the boy to whom he had become greatly attached, and to place him into worthier hands. Under the pretence that he could teach him nothing more, he pressed little Hannes upon the attention of the famous Eduard Marxsen, and, after many fruitless attempts, finally extracted the desired promise from that excellent but unwilling master before the parents had come to terms with their would-be 'manager.' As a result, and because the boy's people recognized the importance of allowing Hannes to study with so distinguished a teacher, the proposed tour in the land of dollars came to naught.

THE GÜRZENICH CONCERT-ROOM, COLOGNE.

The Gürzenich, in which Elgar's 'Apostles' was performed on Whitsunday, is a fifteenth century building erected by the Town Council at a cost of 80,000 florins, from the plans of Johann von Büren. It was erected as a banqueting hall wherein to entertain distinguished visitors in a style befitting the wealth and power of the free city of Cologne. The Emperor Frederick III. was the first in whose honour the hall was thrown open for the purpose of a great festival. This occurred in 1475, Cologne being at the height of its prosperity. Similar festivals took place in 1486, 1505, and 1521. During the eighteenth century the great hall fell into decay and was used as a magazine. Restored in 1857 by Julius Raschdorff, it has since served as the principal concert and meeting hall of proud 'Colonia Agrippina.' Here the Lower Rhine musical Festivals have taken place triennially, and many masterpieces have been produced within those historic walls. One of the more recent was Richard Strauss's unique 'Till Eulenspiegel,' which received its baptism of fire appropriately in the Gürzenich, which sees more of the 'merry pranks' of a Continental carnival than any other hall in the Fatherland. The fine frescoes (shown in the photograph) are by the painters Camphausen, Roeber, Beckmann, and Bauer. They represent the great historical procession organized in honour of the Emperor William I. when he came to Cologne in 1880 with nearly the whole of the Sovereign princes of Germany to celebrate the completion of the famous Cathedral. The handsome wooden roof of the 'Festsaal' is supported by twenty-two massive and elaborately carved wooden columns. The gallery (there are no balconies) is so highly placed that the occupants can almost touch the roof. In fact, the Gürzenich is by no means an ideal concert-room, as regards either accommodation or acoustics, wherefore the desire for a new and up-to-date hall is being continually expressed in the local press and musical circles. There was something historically appropriate about the performance of an important English work in this hall, seeing that at the time of its foundation in the fifteenth century the trade between Cologne and London had assumed great proportions, and the Gürzenich merchants had warehouses at the London Guildhall. Another coincidence which tickled the fancy of the English visitors to the Festival was the fact that Cologne possesses two churches called respectively after 'The Apostles' and 'St. Gereon,' which recalled the titles of the distinguished English master's chiefest choral works.

We regret to place on record the death, at the age of forty-nine, of Mr. William Augener, which took place at Tunbridge Wells on June 19. He was the eldest son of Mr. George Augener, the well-known music-publisher, with whom much sympathy will be felt.

The death took place at Baden, near Vienna, on May 30, at the age of eighty-four, of Dr. Hermann Rollett, author of a pamphlet 'Beethoven in Baden,' to which and to its author reference was made by Mr. C. A. Barry in THE MUSICAL TIMES of February, 1903, p. 102.

The Baume (Manx) Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music will be competed for in September, and will be awarded for promise in any branch of music by candidates between the ages of 14 and 22 years, subject to certain conditions. The successful candidate will be entitled to three years' free instruction at the Academy.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Jubilee of the opening of the Crystal Palace was jubilantly commemorated on Saturday, June 11, by a 'Grand Jubilee Concert,' conducted by the veteran Sir August Manns, now in his eightieth year. Sir August—who played an E flat clarinet in the band at the opening of the 1851 Exhibition building upon its re-erection at Sydenham—has been connected with the Palace for nearly half-a-century, in fact during the whole time of its existence, except for one year between November, 1854, and October, 1855; since the latter date he has worthily held the important post of musical director. The chief feature of the Jubilee Concert was a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' to which succeeded a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Madame Albani, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley, with Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock at the organ.

It may not be without interest to turn to the accounts of the opening ceremony, by Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort, on June 10, 1854. Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Grove was the first secretary of the Crystal Palace Company, and, with characteristic enthusiasm, he conceived the idea of an Ode being written for the inauguration of the fairy-like structure—the words of the Ode to be written by Tennyson and set to music by Berlioz! Grove went off to see Tennyson at Farringford, but the poet did not take to the proposal: he was much happier in explaining to his genial and knowledge-gathering visitor the difference between a cowslip and an oxlip:—

As cowslip unto oxlip is

So seems she to the boy.

This he did—as Grove told the writer of the biographical sketch of him which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of October, 1897—'by picking one of each in the copse behind the house, and showing me how that one stood erect and the other drooped its head.' To return to the Crystal Palace. Mr. J. W. Davison, in the Musical World, wrote a rather sarcastic leading article on the music at the opening ceremony. He said: 'How much was expected, how much was promised, and how little was done, are now matters of history.' 'J. W. D.' went on to remark:—

In the ranks of the chorus, Lablache, and a host from the Italian and German operas, occupied conspicuous places. No end of amateurs from the provinces who profess to be singers or players, and no end of amateurs both provincial and metropolitan who profess nothing of the kind, were stationed in the orchestra. Some of the directors of the Philharmonic Society (the old Philharmonic—Mr. Costa does not 'recognize' the new Philharmonic, any more than he 'recognizes' the music of Sterndale Bennett) were among the chorus, for what purpose, and through what interest, we are unable to say. All we have to urge on this head is the somewhat important fact, that those amateurs who—no matter through what influence—took part, or presumed to take part, in the chorus, and those persons who were there without doing active service, entailed a loss of two guineas each on the Company of the Crystal Palace; since, but for the position accorded them among the vocalists and instrumentalists, they must have purchased season tickets, in order to be present on the grand occasion. How many such were 'privileged,' we leave to the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society, who monopolized the job, to answer.

It is no wonder that Davison put the question: 'After all that has been said and done, in anticipation, of what was the programme ultimately composed? Here it is,' he says:—

The National Anthem—solos by Mdme. Clara Novello.

The 100th Psalm.

The Hallelujah Chorus.

The National Anthem—solos by Mdme. Clara Novello.

J. W. D. then lets himself go in the following protesting outburst:—

That was all. And how were these pieces executed, which were considered so difficult that the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society were compelled to engage an Italian conductor to direct them? With one exception—the magnificent singing of Clara Novello, an English-woman, whose clear and powerful soprano resounded through the Palace, and filled it to the extremities with delicious sounds, which reverberated again and again, until the ears of the '40,000' were so ravished, that they forgot they could see nothing, and every heart was bursting with loyalty and patriotism—with this one exception, it was wholly unworthy of the occasion. The Hundredth Psalm, as more than one informed us, who had assisted at both ceremonies, was better sung at the Dublin Exhibition last year. The 'Hallelujah,' the sublimest of all hymns of exultation and thanksgiving, was taken so slow that in some parts it might very well have served for a dirge. Moreover, the new brass band of foreigners, conducted by Herr Schallehn, a foreigner, was seldom in time and always out of tune with the choir; and the parts for all sorts of brass instruments, added to the score by some bold and uncompromising hand, helped rather to mystify than augment the effect of Handel's tremendous pæan, which, had an English musician been appointed conductor, would have been left alone in its glory. In one place, we thought, the brass band came in a bar too soon; but, of course, that must have been an error of apprehension or a fault of hearing. Let it pass for as much and no more.

Such was the effect of the '1,700' vocalists and instrumentalists, organized by 'the greatest musical society,' and marshalled by 'the greatest musical conductor' throughout the length and width of Europe, with the object of illustrating, by a musical performance on an unprecedented scale, one of the grandest and most auspicious events in the history of the world. The National Anthem was prodigious—simple, impressive, and sublime, as the National Anthem must be on every solemn occasion where the pulse of a nation beats in response to those words of loyalty, devotion, and love of country in the person of its highest representative, the Sovereign. But then, there was Clara Novello—that high and exquisite, that thrilling, piercing, long-sustained B flat, one note, itself a melody no lark or nightingale could match, is still ringing in our ear, 'the trumpet of a prophecy' of peace and love and plenty to the world!—there was Clara Novello, with the throat of a bird, the voice of an angel, and the enthusiasm of a patriot. And then the '40,000' beyond the barriers, some with rough and honest, some with sweet and touching, others with as good and powerful and well intoned voices as any of the '1,700' set before Her Majesty, echoed and re-echoed the heart-moving strains, till 'God save the Queen' was as the one universal cry of a mighty people, declaring its freedom, its honour, its greatness, its power, its large heart that yearns to the world, and its love for the gracious and illustrious lady whose mild and affectionate sway is at once its happiness and its appeal.

If J. W. D. started his article in the 'wrote sarcastic' mood, he finished in tones of loyalty: perchance the voice of Clara Novello touched his heart-strings in a patriotic place.

Reviews.

The History of American Music. By Louis C. Elson.

(New York : The Macmillan Company ; London : Macmillan and Company, Limited.)

IN THE MUSICAL TIMES of February, 1900, we passed favourable judgment on a dainty book entitled 'The National Music of America and its sources.' The author of that interesting little volume, Mr. Louis C. Elson, now comes before us in an admirably got-up quarto tome—forming one of a series entitled 'The History of American Art'—treating very exhaustively of the rise and progress of American music. Its 380 pages may be almost equally divided into (a) history and (b) persons, though each is a complement of the other. The wide scope of this History may be estimated from its chapter headings : (1) The religious beginnings of American music ; (2) Early musical organizations ; (3) Instrumental music and American orchestras ; (4) Musical Societies and Institutions ; (5) Opera in America ; (6) The Folk-music of America ; (7) National and patriotic music : while chapters 8 to 12 treat of American Composers. The remaining sections are devoted to Organists, choir, and chorus leaders ; American women in music ; Musical criticism and authorship ; The musical education of the present ; and Qualities and defects of American music : a General Bibliography and an excellent Index complete the work.

From the foregoing outline of contents it will be seen that Mr. Elson's handsome volume is quite encyclopedic in its nature, and therefore it is impossible to do justice to its merits in the space at our disposal. We hope however to call further attention to the book on one or more future occasions. In the meantime we may sample these entertaining and instructive pages with a few references thereto. The author traces the first beginnings of American music to the Psalm-singing of the Pilgrim Fathers who, easily satisfied souls, were content with five tunes for their Psalmody. The first American composer is stated to be William Billings (1746-1800), who was born and who died at Boston. We learn that he was a self-taught musician ; as an apprentice to a tanner, he seems to have neglected his regular work, in some degree, for the avocation of composition. He wrote his earliest attempts at harmony with chalk upon the sides of leather in the tannery. The old adage 'Nothing like leather' evidently had a limited, though useful, application in the opinion of Mr. Billings. This tanner-musician was also something of a poet, and a thorough patriot to boot. Rhymingly saith he :—

Let tyrants shake their iron rod
And Slavery clank her galling chains,
We'll fear them not ; we trust in God,
New England's God for ever reigns.

Another specimen of his poetry shows that though born in the New country, Billings felt no animosity towards the Old :—

O, praise the Lord with one consent,
And in this grand design,
Let Britain and the Colonies, Unanimously join.

It is interesting to find this love for the mother-land showing itself now and then. For instance, at 'A public concert of vocal and instrumental music' given for the benefit of a Mr. Flagg (a very patriotic name, by-the-way) at Boston in 1769, we find in an advertisement this information : 'The vocal part to be performed by Four Voices, and to conclude with the British Grenadiers.' That the Bostonians were ever enterprising is recorded in an 'order for an oratorio' given to Beethoven by a Boston banker. This was in 1823. Mr. Elson tells us : 'At that time Beethoven was about to begin a work to be entitled "The Victory of the Cross" for a Viennese society, and he determined to send this work (which he afterwards abandoned) to Boston.' We are not surprised to learn that Beethoven was delighted with this commission from across the ocean.

Considering the dominating influence of Opera in New York in the present day, it is interesting to turn to the accounts of its early days. The real beginning of Opera in New York dates from 'the fall of 1825,' when 'there came to the city a well-equipped opera troupe under the management of Manuel Garcia, himself a tenor of high rank. Garcia brought with him his family, each member of which was an important singer, his son being a bass, his wife a soprano, and his daughter (afterwards Madame Malibran) a great contralto.' Mr. Elson says that the orchestra at that memorable season (1825-26) was a large one for the period—7 violins, 2 violas, 3 violoncellos, 2 double-basses, 2 flutes, 2 clarinets, 1 bassoon, 2 horns, 2 trumpets, and 1 pair of drums. He quotes a newspaper criticism upon one of the earliest performances :—

The violins might be a little too loud ; but one soul seemed to inspire and a single hand to guide the whole band throughout the magic mazes of Rossini's most intricate flights, under the direction of Mr. de Luce ; while M. Etienne presided in an effective manner at a fine-toned piano, of which every now and then he might be heard to touch the key-note by those whose attention was turned that way, and just loud enough to be heard throughout the orchestra, for whose guidance it was intended.

But the temptation to quote from these most interesting and researchful pages must be strenuously resisted. The work, which appears to be admirably done, is invaluable as a book of reference, and the general reader may spend some pleasant hours in reading Mr. Elson's well-told story. The profuse illustrations (twelve of which are full-page photogravures), facsimiles, &c., 114 in number, add to the attractiveness of an excellent compilation.

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Romance in A. For Violin and Pianoforte. By Theodore S. Holland.

In the Spring. For Violin and Pianoforte. By John E. West.

Three Dances from 'The Tempest.' By Arthur Sullivan.
Arranged for Violin and Pianoforte by C. Egerton Lowe.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The Romance has always been a favourite form of composition with violinists, and it is an interesting and instructive study to trace its gradual development from the simple song of bygone days to the soul-stirring rhapsodical fantasies of the present age. The Romance in A by Mr. Theodore S. Holland lies well between these extremes, and may be cited as an excellent and commendable specimen of the Romance in its modern form. The opening theme, quiet and dignified, at once enlists one's sympathy, and its development is so skillfully and spontaneously worked out that interest never flags. Towards the close the re-appearance of the first subject at a higher octave on the E string—an idea often productive of a weak and cheap effect—is prepared with so much dignity and passes so deftly into a charming and expressive Coda that nothing but the most pleasing impression is created thereby. The violin part contains no special difficulty, but the pianoforte accompaniment requires a dexterous—or, rather, ambidextrous accompanist. The Romance may be recommended to soloists, and is welcome not only for its own merits but as a possible advent of greater things from the same pen.

'In the Spring,' by Mr. John E. West, is a pretty idea, containing much to charm and please both player and listener. Its difficulties are few, save for an octave here and there not too easily approached, and a few pizzicato chords. The accompaniment and happy harmonies are those of the skilled artist.

Three Dances from Arthur Sullivan's orchestral music to 'The Tempest' were recently published as pianoforte solos, and they have now been further arranged for violin and pianoforte by C. Egerton Lowe. For their due performance a fair amount of technical skill is required from both executants, especially in light staccato playing ; but, well-handled, they should prove effective and acceptable pieces. The themes are fully characteristic of the dainty grace and charm for which their composer was so celebrated, and all three Dances readily and effectively lend themselves to their present adaptation.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED IN THE YEAR 1844.

THE MUSICAL TIMES is the oldest English journal devoted to music and musicians; moreover, its existence has exceeded that of any other musical journal issued, or that has ever been issued, in this country. Started in June, 1844, it first appeared in the form of a modest sheet of eight pages; but in the intervening sixty years it has, like Topsy, "grewed" to about seventy pages every month.

Quantity, however, is not the summum bonum of a musical journal—quality should occupy the first place. If the quality test can be put to the proof by mentioning the names of contributors, THE MUSICAL TIMES has no reason to fear the result. The following have been some of the writers during recent years:

C. A. Barry, Joseph Bennett, Vernon Blackburn, Rev. Francis L. Cohen, Frederick Corder, Henry Coward, F. H. Cowen, W. H. Cummings, W. H. Hadow, Edward Heron-Allen, A. J. Hipkins, Arthur Johnstone, A. Kalisch, H. E. Krehbiel, Robin Legge, Otto Lessmann, Charles Maclean, J. A. Fuller Maitland, W. G. McNaught, E. Mandyczewski, F. Niecks, Ebenezer Prout, W. Barclay Squire, J. S. Shedlock, J. F. R. Stainer, Franklin Taylor, Herbert Thompson and F. Gilbert Webb.

Biography has been made a special feature during the past seven years. Upwards of sixty Biographical Sketches, with special supplement portraits, have appeared since July, 1897. These articles have been received with much favour both at home and abroad, and in Britain beyond the seas. English and foreign musicians of eminence, contemporary and bygone, have been included in this large gallery of MUSICAL TIMES Biographical Sketches: the subjoined list of names speaks for itself.

Illustrations have become an important and almost indispensable adjunct of present-day periodicals. This much-appreciated feature has of late been considerably developed in the pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES. A series of articles on English Cathedrals and College Chapels has furnished scope for the pictorial embellishment of the descriptive matter relating to these interesting subjects. This illustrated series will be continued, and also the articles on important musical libraries, public and private.

The survey under the heading Church and Organ Music has been greatly extended. The aim has been to provide matter that shall be both interesting and of practical helpfulness to those who officiate in "Quires and places where they sing."

The old-established characteristics of THE MUSICAL TIMES have been brought up to date. The "Occasional Notes," or leaderettes—as they are sometimes fancifully termed—cover a wide range of subjects. The monthly letters of such distinguished writers as Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of New York, and Dr. Eusebius Mandyczewski, of Vienna, need no commendation; and the periodical records of music-makings in various centres of musical activity are supplied by the leading writers on music in the Provinces. In the "Answers to Correspondents" section, no pains are spared in furnishing satisfactory replies to the questions asked, even though the interrogations be, as they often are, posers.

Reference may be made to the music—anthems or part-songs—appearing month by month, and to other well-known features of this old-established journal. THE MUSICAL TIMES has a large circle of friends and well-wishers in various parts of the world; and the many gratifying tokens of appreciation that are constantly being received, not only by letter but by frequent quotation in the Press, act as a stimulus to the Editor to increase the brightness of its pages and to make the paper more acceptable in the future even than in the past.

The Diversions of a Music-lover. By C. L. Graves.
[Macmillan & Co., Limited.]

The name of the author of this book is a sufficient guarantee that the reader will spend a profitable and, we may add, amusing hour in perusing the pages of these Diversions. The volume consists of twenty essays, of which fourteen are serious and the remainder humorous. They have previously appeared in various journals, including THE MUSICAL TIMES, but Mr. Graves is a writer that one can always pleasantly re-read, because what he has to say he says so well. His versatility has full scope in these pages. As a specimen of his irresistible fun we give some extracts from the paper on 'Studies in Musical Criticism—The Irrelevant,' evidently written from the point of view of a ladies' newspaper:—

Dearest Dolabella,—You will, I am sure, be dying to hear about the dresses worn at the Creation—the oratorio, I mean—which was given by the Sacred Philharmonic Society at the Mendelssohn Hall last night. My dear Dolabella, Alpatti's dress was a perfect dream of delight. Just fancy: the bodice of crushed Cape gooseberry satin, veiled in accordion-pleated chiffon—so appropriate to a musician!—of an Esterhazy brown tint. You know, of course, that dear old Haydn was a music-master, or something or other, to one of the Esterhazys in the fifteenth century—or was it the seventeenth? . . . I was rather surprised to notice that Mr. Edward Davies, the tenor, only wore two studs in his enamelled shirt-front; but I am told that it renders the production of his high A's much easier. . . . I had so much to do in 'memorising' the dresses and nodding to friends that I had really no time to listen to the music, which was, of course, played and sung to perfection. And now, dear, let me give you the original recipe for a tomato omelette; you will find it excellent after singing, bicycling, or a 'Mental Science' lecture:—Take ten tomatoes, and soak them in boiling water for one and a-half hours; then stew them for one and a-half more, adding a pint of cream, three blades of mace, six peppercorns, and a pair of pangolins. Now take them carefully from the liquor and place them gently but firmly in a hair sieve, rub them through, and fry in hot, clean lard, arrange on a napkin, and give liberally to the poor. Ever, dearest Dolabella, your doting cousin, Araminta.—P.S. On looking casually at my programme I find that there is no contralto in the Creation, so I must have seen Miss Buttson somewhere else.

Wit and wisdom are happily blended in the pages of these delightful diversions of a music-lover. That the book will find many readers is a foregone conclusion.

Old English Organ Music. Edited by John E. West.

1. Overture in C—Thomas Adams.
2. Introduction and Fugue in C minor—Dr. Ben Cooke.
3. Voluntary in G minor—John Stanley.
4. Prelude and Fugue in E minor—T. A. Walmisley.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

There is so much unorganlike music in vogue nowadays that the above sterling pieces are doubly welcome. It was a happy thought on the part of Mr. John E. West to edit a series of these old-time compositions and make them available for playing on modern instruments. Thomas Adams was not only one of the most remarkable organists of his day, but as an extempore player he was unrivalled. His Overture in C is a favourite of Sir Walter Parratt's, and worthily so. The Introduction and Fugue of Dr. Ben Cooke, a former organist of Westminster Abbey, is a spirited composition that would prove very effective in the hands of a skilful player, of whom there are now so many, and no one could fail to be impressed with the stately chords and harmonic progressions of the concluding ten bars. John Stanley, the famous blind organist of the Temple Church in 1734 and Master of the King's Musick, is laid under contribution for No. 3 of this series, a Voluntary in G minor—an old title that is very elastic in its meaning, as those who tackle the allegro moderato section of this piece will bear testimony. The last of this quartet of pieces is the beautiful Prelude and Fugue in E minor, composed in 1839 by that gifted musician Thomas Attwood Walmisley for Vincent Novello's 'Select Organ Pieces.' We remember hearing it in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, on one occasion, when the interpreter thereof remarked upon its natural beauty, and no wonder. The piece is one that should be in the repertoire of all organists who can appreciate a good thing in the way of legitimate organ music. The brief biographical notes prefixed to each composition contribute to the usefulness of this interesting series of 'Old English Organ Music.'

THE SIXTEENTH CINCINNATI FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, June 4, 1904.

The Sixteenth Biennial May Music Festival at Cincinnati took place on the four days from May 11 to 15 inclusive. Like all its predecessors back to the first, which was held in 1873 (there was an interregnum in 1877 to allow time for the erection of the Springer Hall, which was built for the Festivals), the Festival under notice was conducted by Mr. Theodore Thomas, and like many of its predecessors it was distinguished by the participation of English artists. There was a full quartet of these singers—Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and they gave a very good account of themselves, especially in Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' which Mr. Thomas had made the central feature of the meeting. In the other choral works—which were Bach's Mass in B minor, Beethoven's Solemn Mass in D major, and the same composer's Choral Symphony—the contralto solos were sung by Madame Schumann-Heink instead of by Miss Foster.

The Festival choir numbered 423 voices, divided as follows: sopranos, 166; contraltos, 136; tenors, 46; and basses, 75. These figures do not indicate that the choir was perfect in balance, nor was it; but the disproportion between the men's voices and the women's was not so great in effect as might be thought, for the reason that the male choristers were decidedly superior to the females in training and experience. For ordinary purposes the orchestra numbered ninety men, but this was increased to 130 players for the Bach Mass, Mr. Thomas repeating with some significant modifications his experiment of two years ago with the instrumental parts of the work, multiplying the wind instruments in all the choral accompaniments. The nucleus of the Festival band was the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which has been under Mr. Thomas's direction for thirteen years, and which, after being threatened with disruption, has finally been put upon what is hoped will prove a permanent basis, as has been explained in previous letters. Cincinnati has a permanent Symphony Orchestra of its own, but Mr. Thomas cannot bring himself to believe that it is part of the purpose of the Festivals to promote any local institution except the chorus, and nearly all of the reinforcements were brought from Chicago. Under the circumstances it is scarcely necessary to say that the ageing of Mr. Thomas (he is now in his 70th year) periodically provokes speculation as to the future of the Festivals. Personal equation plays an important part in their management.

The programmes which Mr. Thomas prepared for this Festival were uncompromising in their severity. Beethoven's Mass and Symphony occupied one evening; 'The Dream of Gerontius' was associated with the between-acts music to 'Grania and Diarmid' by Edward Elgar; Richard Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration'; the great scena from 'Fidelio,' sung by Miss Agnes Nicholls; and the 'Imperial Hymn,' written by Berlioz for a function at the Paris Exhibition of 1855. The instrumental introit to the Bach Mass was the Suite in B minor for strings and flute, which under the circumstances made a peculiarly lame and impotent beginning for the Festival. At the first of the miscellaneous afternoon concerts there were two symphonies (Mozart in E flat and Beethoven in F, No. 8), besides eight other numbers—one Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, another the prelude and finale to 'Tristan und Isolde.' At the Saturday afternoon concert one of the numbers was the 'Unfinished' Symphony by Anton Bruckner, another Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, two others the prelude to 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.' Even then there was more. A New York or Boston audience would have run away from such a plethora; but the festival spirit saved the day in Cincinnati. The choral work, which had been prepared by Edwin W. Glover, chorus master, was superior to that heard at any of the three or four Festivals preceding, in spite of the magnitude of the undertaking, and the orchestral work was distinguished by brilliancy, precision, and beauty of tone, but not by warmth and eloquence of reading. The Festival differed also from its immediate predecessors for a decade past in proving a financial success. The receipts were nearly 36,000 dollars, which sum sufficed to meet all the expenses.

On the evening before 'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed at the Festival—that is to say, on the evening of May 13, Elgar's work was brought forward at a Festival at Ann Arbor, Mich., under the direction of Professor A. A. Stanley, of the University of Michigan. This Festival was one of a series at which the Boston Festival Orchestra took part in Syracuse, N.Y., Richmond, Va., Spartanburg, S.C., Champaign, Ills., Ann Arbor, Mich., Albany, N.Y., and Springfield, Mass. At the majority of these meetings the 'choral' part of the programme consisted of an opera given in concert form—'Faust,' 'Aida,' and 'Carmen' being the works thus exploited. Operas in concert dress are a pitiful sop to Cerberus from an artistic point of view, but find justification in the eyes of some on the ground that it is only thus that communities never visited by opera companies can hear the music of works whose fame fills the world. But that such a combination as 'Carmen' and 'The Dream of Gerontius' should be possible in a town boasting one of the largest Universities in the world with a chair of music, is at once anomalous and humiliating. At the Albany Festival, given under the direction of Arthur Mees, who was long associated with Mr. Thomas in the Cincinnati enterprise, there was nothing of this sort. Bruch's 'Odysseus' was given on the first day, Haydn's 'Creation' and the 'Dies Iræ' from Berlioz's 'Messe des Morts' on the second.

H. E. KREHBIEL.

THE LOWER RHINE MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT COLOGNE.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

It is nearly a month since I heard 'The Apostles' at Cologne, and I am still under the stirring influence of a performance which spoke as eloquently for Herr Steinbach's command over his forces as for the composer's mastery of his technical means. I have heard better choirs and superior chorus singing at English Festivals, but never a performance of the orchestral score of a choral work so finished in every detail and so exhaustive as regards the spiritual significance as that given at Cologne on Whitsunday. How much depends upon the orchestral score of a work like 'The Apostles'! It is as important for a proper appreciation of the oratorio as it is in Wagner's 'Tristan' or 'Parsifal' for the understanding of those great works. The true enjoyment of a superb score such as Elgar's can only come with a perfect performance of what is traditionally called 'the accompaniment,' but what is in reality, as in the later works of Wagner, the most important factor in the composer's scheme. As I sat under the spell of Herr Steinbach's magic unfolding of the beauties of a score of which he is a most enthusiastic admirer, I experienced true enjoyment, and that a great part of the audience felt similarly impressed, their wonderful devotional silence during the progress of the work, as well as their enthusiasm after both parts, amply testified. If I had heard nothing else at Cologne I should not have grudged the long journey thither, because it gave me that rarest experience of a critic, an altogether new standard to be applied to performances of modern oratorio.

As a matter of fact I heard a good deal of excellent music, e.g., there were quite phenomenal performances of Beethoven's Seventh and Brahms's Fourth Symphonies. The latter much maligned work especially received a reading full of life and feeling, of strength and beauty. Herr Steinbach is famous as a Brahms conductor, and I heard the same symphony under him last year in London. But on the present occasion, with an orchestra of 150 performers, he surpassed himself, and I feel more inclined than ever to agree with those German critics who call this the greatest symphony since Beethoven. Then we heard a glorious performance of Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto, No. 3, played by thirty-six violins, twenty-four violas, eighteen violoncellos, and twelve basses. The last movement was actually encores! and no wonder, for I can only repeat it was phenomenal, not on the score of the jumboism suggested by the number of executants, but on artistic grounds, viz., tone, finish, and spirit. The audience were delirious with delight, and over Bach! The great Sebastian was also represented by the humorous cantata 'Der Zufriedenstellte Æolus,' which I candidly confess bored me with its long succession of 'comic' airs and endless recitatives. The work requires quite a special treatment at the hands, or rather mouths of the singers, and such treatment was not forthcoming. Brahms's 'Triumphlied,' and four lovely quartets (Op. 92 and Op. 64) for solo voices and the 'Emperor' Concerto, superbly played by M. Paderewski, completed the programme of the second concert which, as will have been noted, was devoted to the three great musical B's—Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

Dr. Richard Strauss's 'Taillefer,' a ballad for soli, chorus, and orchestra, was the great attraction of the third concert. It is laid out on would-be popular lines. The voice parts are comparatively straightforward and diatonic, but in the dramatic situations the orchestral writing is as complex as ever. The music bounds along with the strepitous swing of 'Don Juan' and 'Heldenleben' towards the climax, for which the poem was evidently chosen by a composer who loves to work in the Erles vein. This is the scene of the 'Battle of Hastings.' I will not try to describe it, but content myself with the remark that, compared with this 'Battle of Hastings' the battle of Charlottenburg—otherwise Strauss's studio—in 'Heldenleben' is the merest lullaby. Max Bruch's 'Sanctus' for two soprano soloists, double chorus and orchestra (Op. 35) is a fine though scarcely inspired piece of sacred music, massively planned, richly scored, dignified and impressive. It was well sung and warmly received. The original version of 'Lohengrin's Erzählung' was an interesting novelty. The additional twenty-four lines of poetry contain some beautiful music in the style of what precedes it, but there can be no doubt about Wagner's wisdom in cutting them, since the climax, dramatically and therefore musically, is Lohengrin's declaration 'Sein Ritter, ich-bin Lohengrin genannt.' Herr Knote sang the Scena magnificently. Ernst von Wildenbruch's striking poem 'Das Hexenlied' (The Witch's Song) was recited by Dr. Ludwig Wüllner, and his intensely dramatic and exquisitely modulated interpretation was one of the most perfect, as it was certainly one of the most moving, efforts of the whole Festival. Herr Max Schillings's accompanying melodramatic music betrays the hand of an earnest and talented artist. It creates the requisite atmosphere, and helps to intensify the effect of some of the most affecting situations. Moreover, it is well scored in dark, gloomy colours. Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. and H. No. 3), and the final scene of 'Die Meistersinger' completed the gigantic programme.

Altogether a delightful Festival, one which meant another triumph for an English master and, moreover, for one of the greatest of living conductors, General-Musikdirektor Fritz Steinbach, of whom a photograph is given on p. 445.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The performances given under Dr. F. H. Cowen's direction respectively on June 2 and 16, at Queen's Hall, call for praise and congratulation rather than criticism. On the former date the chief feature was a magnificent interpretation of César Franck's fine Symphony in D minor, a noble work which has too long been mute. Worthy of record also is Mr. Charles Draper's brilliant playing in the solo part of Sir Charles Stanford's Clarinet Concerto in A minor (Op. 80), Mdlle. Annie de Jong's violin playing in Dvorák's seldom-heard Concerto (Op. 53), and the reappearance of Miss Muriel Foster after her American-Canadian tour, who sang in Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto solo, male choir, and orchestra. The chorus parts in the last-named work were sung by the gentlemen of the Alma Mater Choir, consisting of past students of the Royal Academy of Music, the general finish of their interpretation testifying to excellent training.

Tschaikovsky's Fantaisie, 'Francesca da Rimini,' Dr. Cowen's Indian Rhapsody, and Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2), presented effective contrasts at the concert of June 16, and all, without exception, were rendered in a manner that bore witness to the versatility of the instrumentalists as well as to the insight of their conductor. Perhaps the most memorable performance was that of M. Raoul Pugno in Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, which elicited the most enthusiastic applause. How refreshing the music, and how delightful the delicacy of the pianist's touch and the charm of his interpretation!

THE ROYAL OPERA.

M. SAINT-SAËNS'S 'HÉLÈNE.'

'Hélène,' the latest dramatic creation of M. Saint-Saëns, was originally produced at Monte Carlo in February last and was mounted at Covent Garden Theatre for the first time in England on June 20. Although it is not a work that will add to the fame of the composer, yet every page of the score bears witness to skilful craftsmanship. It is described as a 'Poème lyrique en un acte,' but although this in a measure disarms criticism concerning its lack of dramatic action, it does not condone the paucity of melodic inspiration and the feeble character of the greater part of the music. The 'poem' opens with a brief prelude of little musical interest save that it foreshadows the principal themes. When the curtain rises the exterior of the Palace of Ménélas is seen, while from within is heard a chorus, led by Paris, in praise of the king. This scene only lasts a few minutes, and gives place to a rocky seashore. Hither Hélène comes to escape from the suit of Paris, and in a long monologue she reviews her position, finally coming to the conclusion that the only way to preserve her honour is to drown herself. The music in this portion is always refined, and in one section possesses considerable charm, but it never gives adequate expression to the agonized words put by the composer—who is his own librettist—into the mouth of Hélène. As she is about to take the fatal plunge an apparition appears of Venus surrounded by her nymphs on an enchanted island. The Goddess of Love, for reasons which students of mythology will remember, bids Hélène surrender herself to Paris, and does so to graceful strains supported by a pretty chorus of nymphs. The way is thus prepared for the entrance of Paris, who proves such a fervent and persistent suitor that Hélène ultimately confesses her love for him. Towards the close of this scene the music, becoming more intense, is worked up to a dramatic climax by the sudden appearance of Pallas, who in dignified accents warns the lovers of the consequences of their proposed flight, and in order to impress them, shows a vision of Troy in flames. The composer here had a fine opportunity, but he has treated the incident in a classical style, and no attempt is made to musically illustrate the scene of conflagration, except by some harmonious-descending choral passages, sung behind the scenes, which sound curiously incongruous to the picture of devastation set before the spectator. Paris refuses to be influenced by any peeps into futurity, and Hélène, not to be outdone in disregard of consequences, yields herself to him, and in the final tableau the lovers are seen sailing away over the sea. Before they start, however, they sing a duet, which is the most distinctive portion of the work, the chief phrase being the nearest approach to inspiration in the score.

The title-part was created by Madame Melba at Monte Carlo, and she manifestly sang the music at Covent Garden with a determination to do it full justice. It cannot be said, however, that the music is well suited to her style, or that it is always grateful to sing. The rôle of Paris was sustained by M. Dalmores, whose vivacity warded off threatening monotony. The address of Pallas was magnificently delivered by Madame Kirkby Lunn, and Miss Parkina sang prettily as Venus. The orchestral portion was admirably rendered under M. Messager's direction, who conducted at M. Saint-Saëns's special request. The scenery, specially painted by Mr. Harry Brooke, was most picturesque, and in the lobbies it seemed to excite more admiration than the music! At the fall of the curtain there was a prolonged effort to get M. Saint-Saëns on the stage, but he firmly declined to appear.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A DVORÁK 'IN MEMORIAM' CONCERT.

We feel disposed to cry shame upon London concert-givers for having utterly ignored the death of Antonin Dvorák, that bright genius whom but a few years ago English music-lovers were delighted to honour. Therefore, considering this neglect, the admirers of the great Bohemian composer owe special thanks to the Royal College of Music for arranging an In memoriam Dvorák concert which took place in the College concert hall on June 14. On the whole the concert proved to be one of the best and most enjoyable ever given at the Institution.

The programme opened with the 'New World' Symphony, one of those priceless treasures of art which are a perfect joy and a true happiness whenever heard. It was played with immense gusto, and in a manner all but perfect. The mournful, beautiful melody of the slow movement seemed an appropriate lament for the dead composer, and to touch us more deeply than ever in consequence. No Funeral March could have conveyed so 'personal' a note to the audience as this exquisite open-air 'requiem,' this suggestion of the deepest stillness of night—a stillness as of death—before the birth of dawn. Another splendid performance was that of the brilliant 'Carneval' Overture. Beatrice Dunn sang the favourite air 'Where art thou, father dear,' from 'The Spectre's Bride' fluently and with a pleasing, light, and well-produced soprano voice, which is not yet sufficiently developed in its lower register, however, to do complete justice to the piece. Adelina Leon is another notable addition to the remarkable list of prodigies which this year of grace has produced. To hear a young girl of apparently thirteen or fourteen years of age master the enormous difficulties of Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto—and master them with apparent ease, good tone, perfect intonation, and absolute command of the fingerboard—is nothing less than astounding. We wish we could speak well of the chorus-singing in the 'Patriotic Hymn,' that powerful little choral work which Dvorák 'dedicated with feelings of deep gratitude to the English people.' But truth to tell, it was pointless and ineffective. To hear the short, crisp fortissimo phrases near the end, 'One Home is yours,' sung lackadaisically, with the final crotchet prolonged into anything up to a semibreve according to the fancy of the individual singers, was a surprise. We had foolishly imagined that students of a school of music knew the value of a crotchet. What is the cause of such lassitude? Are these precious students 'above' the 'common' practice of choral singing? If so, let them read their esteemed Director's splendid panegyric of such singing in his 'Art of Music' and mend their ways.

THE MAGPIE MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

This socially and musically select body gave a most enjoyable invitation concert at St. James's Hall on June 1. The programme book gives the names of 68 sopranos, 48 altos, 32 tenors, and 41 basses, a total of 189 performers, many of whom are well-known members of society. It says much for the enthusiasm for the practice of choral music that so many ladies and gentlemen in leading social positions should determine to devote time to rehearse as they must have done to secure so good a result as was exhibited on the present occasion. It was no light task to prepare twenty unaccompanied part-songs and madrigals, some of which were in six parts and two in eight parts, and in addition the difficult chorus part of 'Die Vätergruft' (Peter Cornelius), which of course was also sung unaccompanied. The tone of the voices is distinctly good. There is no thrilling ring of resonance in the fortes like that heard from the best 'farther north' choirs, but the blend is always musical and refined. There were certainly no exaggerations in the expression; indeed one rather yearned at times for more vivid colouring. The lack of great contrast was felt in such pieces as 'The Knight's Tomb,' that fine, if somewhat sepulchral part-song by Sir Charles Stanford, the point of which is missed if it is not treated dramatically.

Then, with a keen recollection of the electrifying effect of Parry's 'Come, pretty wag,' as rendered by many crack choirs, one felt that the 'Magpie' audience which thronged the hall could not have realised the potentialities of this remarkable piece. But if this reluctance to exhibit high colour deprived some of the modern pieces of their legitimate effect, it must be acknowledged that such 'artistic' restraint was admirably adapted to exhibit the charms of the old madrigals, which were most daintily and delightfully performed. Palestrina was represented by 'Non son le vostre mani,' Giovannelli by 'Mi sfidate,' Orazio Vecchi by 'Il bianco a dolce cigno,' and Antonio Scandelli by 'Von einem Hennlein.' The latter piece was piquantly sung and intensely amused the audience. An English version would, we believe, make this curiously modern part-song (Scandelli died in 1580) a welcome addition to the repertory of choral societies in this country. Highly painstaking and expressive performances of the five unaccompanied part-songs (Op. 104) by Brahms were given. 'Im Herbst' was especially impressive. The concert had the advantage of the assistance of Mr. Plunket Greene, who sang the solo part in 'Die Vätergruft' and five of the recently issued 'English Lyrics,' by Sir Hubert Parry. Miss De Angelis, a young and highly promising singer, also sang solos. Mr. Lionel Benson as usual conducted. The high repute of the Society is largely due to this gentleman's fine taste and skilful training.

MR. B. HOLLÄNDER'S ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

M. YSAËE LEADS BEETHOVEN'S C MINOR SYMPHONY.

The second concert of Mr. B. Holländer's Orchestral Society took place at the Kensington Town Hall on June 1. The programme included Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Mozart's 'Zauberflöte' Overture, and Max Bruch's Second Violin Concerto (Op. 44), in which works both conductor and orchestra completely justified the high opinion of their qualities expressed in our last issue. The concerto was played in his grandest manner by M. Eugène Ysaÿe. He was also heard in his own 'Chant d'hiver,' a strange effusion, in which the chill, melancholy loneliness of some vast, snow-clad expanse of moorland seems suggested by means of vague, meandering melodic phrases and even vaguer, far-fetched harmonic devices. The piece cannot be called pleasing, and yet it haunts the memory by reason of the pensive poetry pervading it. In response to a great display of enthusiasm, M. Ysaÿe played one of Beethoven's Romances as an encore, and the enthusiasm broke forth with redoubled vigour when he took his place at the first desk to lead the Symphony, standing up like the rest of the violinists. He 'led' to some purpose, for the first and last movements went with an impetuosity that was absolutely startling. It was a memorable performance. Mr. Percy Pitt's Symphonic Prelude, 'Le Sang des crépuscules,' which completed the programme, is an extraordinary, immensely clever work, but so gloomy and weird in its prevailing mood, and so heavily scored, that we confess to our inability to form an opinion of its qualities after a bewilderingly resonant performance. The short season came to a close on June 22, when two important works were performed for the first time in England, viz., M. C. Saint-Saëns's Second Violoncello Concerto (Op. 119), and Mr. Holländer's own 'Dramatic' Symphony 'Roland' (Op. 24). The French master's work is most effectively written for the instrument, and in many cantabile passages gives the soloist an opportunity for displaying his choicest singing tone. The solo instrument stands out well from a background of a rich orchestral texture; the thematic material is interesting, and handled with M. Saint-Saëns's usual mastery, and altogether this effective Concerto proves that the versatile hand of the distinguished Frenchman has lost none of its cunning. Mr. Joseph Hollman played the solo part with the dash and brilliancy, and with the large and warm tone for which he is famed. We blame Mr. Holländer for having neglected to provide his audience with a synopsis of his Symphony, for we doubt whether one Englishman in a thousand could give an intelligent account of the legendary lore that has been woven round the giant figure (he was eight feet high!) of the redoubtable paladin and nephew of Charlemagne, who asked for the hand of Aude, daughter of Sir Gerard and Lady Guibourg, as a reward for slaying Angoulaffre, the Saracen giant, but before gaining the object of his desires fell into an ambush in the valley of Roncesvalles, in the Pyrenees, and was killed, with the flower of French chivalry (A.D. 778); whereupon his lady-love died of a broken heart. Mr. Holländer gave his audience the titles only of the four movements of his work. Thus the Symphony is programme music, but how closely the details of the story have been followed there was nothing to show. For instance, Roland's most famous deed was to blow his enchanted horn ere he died. He blew it so loudly that Charlemagne heard it many leagues away. But the paladin's heroic bugling effort broke the veins of his neck, with fatal results. Now there are some terrific blasts upon Mr. Holländer's brass, but whether they are meant to describe this tragedy nobody could say. Leaving aside, then, the question of appropriateness to an undisclosed programme, and judging the work as abstract music, we find a lack of continuity; the big, broad sweep of a symphonic movement is only felt in the splendid scherzo named after Roland's trusty sword, 'Durandal,' which movement is consequently by far the most effective. In the remaining portions the halting and re-starting, the losing and picking up of threads which is also so marked a feature in Liszt's symphonic works, tends to break the chain by which our attention should be secured. There stand to Mr. Holländer's credit, however, such excellent assets as long-spun themes of true symphonic importance, impressive climaxes both of dynamic and emotional ebullition, excellent scoring, especially for the brass, deft workmanship whenever he allows himself to be carried away by his ideas as upon some wide river 'rolling rapidly,' and finally the rare quality of individuality which is felt both in the thematic material and in the scoring. The Symphony was splendidly played and well-received. A wonderfully brilliant, rhythmically perfect performance of Berlioz's 'Carnaval Romain' Overture, a short Wagner selection and some songs sung by a Spanish contralto, Madame Marie Gay, completed a highly interesting programme. We are glad to hear that Mr. Holländer will give a second series of concerts in the autumn. May all success attend his artistic endeavours.

THE GIRLS' SCHOOL MUSIC UNION.

The first general meeting and Conference of the Girls' School Music Union was held on May 28, at the Church of England High School for Girls, 6, Upper Baker Street, Lady Mary Lygon, the President of the Union, was in the chair; and among those present were Dr. W. H. Cummings. Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Dr. Arthur Somervell, Miss L. B. Strong (Baker Street High School), Miss Wakefield, a large number of music mistresses, and Miss Cecilia Hill, Hon. Secretary, whose address is The Cedar House, Salt Hill, Slough.

Miss Cecilia Hill said that the objects of their organization were the advancement of music in secondary schools for girls and the discussion of matters connected therewith. She thought that as they had so many members in different parts of the country it would be desirable to establish local branches or centres in various districts. This would do much to keep alive the interest in the Union and, above all, further the objects for which it was established. They all realized the immense value of teachers reading in all subjects, and music was not a subject to be disregarded in that respect. They suffered from want of access to the literature of music; and she suggested that the Union should be invited to sign a giant petition to Mr. Carnegie, who had lately expressed his deep appreciation of music, asking him for a suitable sum to found and completely equip a library of music. In conclusion she proposed that combined concerts should be arranged to be given by several hundreds of the best musicians from the different schools.

The discussion upon the proposed institution of branch societies disclosed the presence of many representatives of famous schools from all parts of the kingdom, who with one consent insisted upon having a free hand in the management of their local centres without interference from headquarters. It seemed to be the general opinion that the study of music in secondary schools is in a shockingly backward state, yet evidences of the highest musical culture amongst the conferees were not wanting, and a number of references to work actually being done in some schools proved that there are bright particular exceptions to the general benightedness deplored.

Miss Strong animadverted upon the tendency to regard 'music' as consisting of pianoforte playing only, to the exclusion of the study of other instruments and of the theory of music, and especially of singing. This is referred to in the resolution passed at the meeting, but it was evident throughout the proceedings that 'music,' to the majority present, was but a euphemism for pianoforte performance. Dr. Somervell made some passing reference to school singing in his paper. He said that, while he was not opposed to part-singing in schools, he preferred good unison singing to bad part-singing, a dictum with which everybody will agree.

Miss Cecilia Hill's proposal to approach Mr. Carnegie with a petition for the formation of a library of music and works upon music for the use of the Union was negatived, and the suggestion that a concert on a Handel Festival scale—consisting of choral and orchestral music performed by pupils from the schools affiliated to the Union—should be given was not very well received. Amusement was created during one of the discussions by a lady delegate who hoped that the teaching of musical form in schools would not be insisted upon. If teachers were expected to make their charges understand 'binary' and 'ternary' form she 'really did not know,' she added pathetically, 'what would occur!' Dr. Cummings, with the courage of his position, said that whenever an ill-taught pupil presented herself at the Guildhall School of Music he discovered nine times out of ten that she had been taught by a lady! Miss Wakefield suggested that only children with ascertained musical ability should be taught music. This idea met with a decidedly unfavourable reception, there being a general feeling that it is not safe or fair to decide that a child is unfitted for musical study without affording its faculties a chance of development. Mrs. Curwen suggested that Miss Wakefield was not speaking seriously, but the latter stood to her guns, and said that if they did as she suggested they would save themselves a lot of unnecessary trouble, and the world at large a corresponding amount of aural agony.

Papers were read by Mr. Arthur H. Peppin (Clifton) on 'Ideals of Music Teaching'; by Mr. Basil Johnson (Rugby) on 'School Orchestras'; by Dr. Arthur Somervell on 'A plea for the more educational treatment of music in girls' schools'; and by Mr. A. Rose on 'The use and abuse of examinations.' In the evening Miss Cecilia Hill was 'at home' to her friends at the Portman Rooms, when an enjoyable selection of music was performed.

Competitions.

MANCHESTER.

The Manchester and District Nonconformist Choir Union, who manage their affairs with great spirit and energy, held their Fourth Annual Choral and Solo-Singing Competition at Belle Vue, Manchester, on June 18. There were satisfactory entries, and the liberal attendance of the public bore witness to the widespread interest taken in the scheme. Thirty-two soloists and thirteen choirs competed. In the principal choral class Heywood Congregational Choir (Mr. W. H. Jewell) was first, the test-piece being the somewhat exacting part-song 'I love the jocund dance' (Corder). In other sections Moss Side Baptist Choir (Mr. J. W. Turner) and Denton Hope Congregational Choir (Mr. Jas. Hardy) were successful. The test-pieces in these classes were 'Weary wind of the west' (Elgar), and 'The chase' (German).

Dr. W. G. McNaught adjudicated. The Union announce a special united concert to be given in the Free Trade Hall on November 5 by 600 voices, under Dr. T. Keighley, who is one of the ablest and most useful members of the organization. The Secretary is Mr. A. Swindells.

THE SOUTHPORT VOCAL UNION.

This body has achieved remarkable successes at competitions under the guidance of Mr. J. C. Clarke. On Whit Monday they gained the first prize of £25 at Llanwrst, and later on in the day another first prize at Prestatyn. At the former event Mr. Clarke was 'crowned' by Prince Christian. Elsewhere we record the appearance of the choir at the Lytham competitions. The list of this choir's successes during the last two or three years is a long one, and is probably a record.

LYTHAM.

Lytham is a seaside resort on the Lancashire coast. A few years ago some of the more optimistic residents started a musical competition on the Morecambe-Blackpool lines. At first the entries were small, but this year, at the competition held on June 9, 10, 11, there were 153 separate entries, including 1,073 competitors. The institution has therefore amply justified its existence. The test-pieces chosen were of an excellent type, and all the arrangements were carried out with good judgment. On the children's day there was some first-rate singing, both prepared and at sight, and an effective performance of the cantata 'The Spider and the Fly' (Bridge) was given under the baton of Mr. Whittaker, of Blackpool. The third day was devoted to 'open' competitions. The Warley Road Congregational Choir, Blackpool, under Mr. Whittaker, gained a first place in the mixed-voice choir section. The male-voice choir competition attracted some of the best northern choirs, including the Manchester Orpheus, the Southport, Colne, Habergham, Nelson Orpheus, Lancaster, and four others. Manchester (Mr. Nesbitt) came out first, Southport (Mr. Clarke) following only one mark behind. The test-pieces were 'Music all powerful' (Walmisley), and 'Peace' (Bridge). The four leading choirs united under the baton of Mr. Nesbitt to give a very impressive performance of Walmisley's majestic piece. Mr. Granville Humphreys and Mr. W. Granger adjudicated. The promoters of the Festival are to be congratulated upon their success. The further expansion of the scheme depends upon the possibility of the powers-that-be in the town building a commodious hall.

SWALEDALE.

A distinctive feature of the 'Swaledale Tournament of Song,' which took place at Richmond (Yorks) on June 1 and 2, was the prominence given to instrumentalists. At present however it is chiefly the budding pianist that is in evidence, and on the opening day at Richmond Mr. T. Tertius Noble, the adjudicator, passed in review no fewer than twenty-nine junior pianists, while on the second day six adult ones submitted themselves to his judgment. The younger players showed in a large proportion of cases the result of that loose method of teaching that is the bane of English music, in which the elements of technique are ignored in haste to get to 'pieces.' The violinists were rather better, but less numerous. The redeeming feature of the senior pianoforte competition was that the candidates made a fairly good show in playing at sight, which very properly is made an addendum, though a voluntary one, to these instrumental classes, and it was satisfactory to note how many competitors essayed it.

The village choirs passed through a highly practical test, in the singing of anthem, chant, and hymn, and here one felt the full value of competition. Conducted as it was in a fashion that was at once reverent and business-like, the possible objections to such a competition were minimized, if not quite done away with. The larger societies of Richmond and Northallerton, which always keenly contend for the mastery at these 'tournaments,' furnished some really excellent performances of Macfarren's 'Orpheus with his lute.'

There were many male-voice quartets, and they reached a creditable standard all round, while the choirs of female voices sang very pleasantly.

The Tournament ended with the best concert ever given at these Swaledale Festivals. The Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett conducted a most creditable performance of Stanford's 'Revenge,' and the small but very efficient orchestra added to the effect of the work as well as appearing to advantage in two or three orchestral pieces. Miss Ethel Henry-Bird and Miss Charlotte Lawson were the vocalists, and their excellent singing was all the more enjoyable from the strong contrast existing between them.

London and Suburban Concerts.

MISS MAY HARRISON.

Recalls innumerable, twenty bouquets and flower baskets, a live Persian kitten in a flower-bedecked cage, a Japanese dwarf-tree in a liliputian glasshouse, and a sea of happy faces belonging to proud relations and friends were the 'reward' of little Miss May Harrison, who made her first public appearance as a violinist at an orchestral concert given on May 31 at St. James's Hall. She is a healthy-looking sturdy child of thirteen, and a born fiddler. Her teaching has been of the best and her tone is strong and of beautiful quality. Even in this annus mirabilis of prodigies she must be counted a revelation, an earnest perhaps of the rare gifts lying latent in many out-of-the-way corners of the British Empire. A new Spring seems approaching for musical England. A Marie Hall, a May Harrison, to mention but two of the most gifted performers would have seemed impossible a decade ago. To-day we may regard their wonderful achievements as the inevitable parallel of the striking development shown in the department of creative art in our country. Miss Harrison's programme put her gifts to a terribly severe test. Commencing with Bach's E major Concerto—of which she gave a beautifully smooth and 'musical' performance—she proceeded to Mendelssohn's lovely Concerto, and after mastering that difficult task in excellent style, attacked Bach's great Chaconne with the assurance of a mature player. It was a performance of such remarkable finish, both from the executive and interpretative points of view, that it sufficed to stamp the player a genuine wonderchild of whom anything and everything may be expected. We are glad to hear that Miss Harrison is not to be exploited by agents, but will be allowed to pursue her studies quietly. Mr. Henry J. Wood conducted the Queen's Hall orchestra in the Concertos, and a number of smaller works, including Sir Edward Elgar's delicious 'Dorabella' Intermezzo from the 'Variations.'

LUND STUDENTS' CHORAL UNION.

The performance given by the 'Lund Students' Choral Union' on June 7 at Queen's Hall is a memorable feature of last month, and it is to be regretted that only one appearance in England was possible owing to the party being on their way to the St. Louis Exhibition. The choristers, fifty-three in number, are all students of Swedish universities. Not only have they been trained to sing with exhilarating verve and precision, but their repertoire is most interesting. Amongst the most striking of Swedish and Norwegian part-songs—all of which were sung unaccompanied—was a setting by F. A. Reissiger of lines based upon the saga of Olav Trygvason, the Norseman given to marrying and to securing converts to Christianity at the sword's point. The inconsistency of his behaviour naturally brought him trouble and ultimately his death. The part-song opens with the men of his fleet patiently waiting his return from an expedition to secure a new wife. They wait in vain, for he has been slain in a sea fight, and this dramatic incident is most effectively treated by the composer. Two songs, respectively named 'Sten Sture,' by August Körling, and 'Den Store Hvide Flok,' by Edvard Grieg, contained baritone solos which were well sung by Herr John Forsell, described as 'operasänger.'

Other part-songs worthy of mention were 'Fredman's Epistel,' by C. M. Bellman, and 'Under Könn och Syren,' by Herm Palm. We shall be glad to hear these Swedish singers again, and we hope they will soon pay us another visit.

GLUCK'S 'ORFEO.'

The performance of operatic works in concert form is not as a rule to be commended, but it is better to hear Gluck's 'Orfeo' in the concert-room than not at all, especially when Miss Giulia Ravogli undertakes the rôle of the husband more than 'faithful unto death,' and the Leeds Choral Union is available to express the woes of Hades and the delights of Elysian fields. Such were the conditions that prevailed on June 3 at Queen's Hall, and the result was an enjoyable evening. The other soloists were Miss Lydia Nervil, who sang sympathetically as Eurydice, and Miss Martha Cunningham, who appeared as Amor. Mr. Alfred Benton secured excellent choral effects, but the orchestra was less satisfactory.

The high esteem in which Mr. Henry R. Bird is held by music lovers caused a very large audience to assemble at St. James's Hall on June 10 when, assisted by his daughter Miss Ethel Henry-Bird, the accompanist par excellence gave his annual concert. In two of Schumann's Romances, and in two 'Lieder ohne Worte,' Mr. Bird showed his skill as a solo pianist, and Miss Henry-Bird was heard in the air 'Depuis le Jour,' from Charpentier's 'Louise' and 'Non, je ne veux pas chanter,' from Nicole Isonard's 'Le Billet de Loterie,' rendering both songs in a manner which showed that this young vocalist is steadily advancing in her art. Miss Ada Crossley fully deserved the applause she received for her delightful interpretations of Brahms's 'Von Ewig Liebe,' Martini's 'Minuet,' and a charming setting by Mr. Roger Quilter of Tennyson's 'Now sleeps the crimson petal.' The other vocalists were Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and Mr. Denham Price. Miss Marianne Eissler and Mr. Herbert Fryer respectively contributed pianoforte and violin solos, and Mr. Henry R. Bird accompanied the songs with his usual perfection.

The Oxford Musical and Dramatic Association, formed in 1898 with the praiseworthy object of providing entertainments of a good class for the inhabitants of Bethnal Green, gave a concert on June 7 at St. James's Hall, under the patronage of the Princess of Wales, who graced the concert with her presence. This excellent Society has a choir and orchestra of considerable dimensions, which gave proof of being carefully and diligently trained. Schubert's cantata, 'The Song of Miriam,' was the principal item in the programme, and its interpretation was most meritorious. Mrs. Henry Wood was the soloist, and has seldom been heard to greater advantage. The ensemble singing of the Excelsior Boys' Choir was a specially interesting and commendable feature. Mr. Gervase Elwes sang 'The Preislied' from 'Die Meistersinger,' and the enjoyment of the evening was further enhanced by the singing of Madame Dale and Miss Muriel Foster. The concert was under the capable direction of Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, the conductor of the Society.

The popular and accomplished contralto Miss Ada Crossley made her first appearance since her return from Australia and New South Wales at St. James's Hall on June 2. This artist's voice seems to have acquired greater charm during her sojourn in her native land, and her renderings of three delightful songs, entitled 'Unmindful of the roses,' 'Oh! what comes over the sea?' and 'When I am dead, my dearest,' accompanied by their composer, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, were most enjoyable. One of the concert-giver's best efforts was her interpretation of Schubert's 'Young Nun.' A group of songs by Mr. G. Clutsam proved attractive, and were sung with taste and discernment. Mr. Percy Grainger contributed some pianoforte solos, and took part with M. Jacobs in some pleasing 'Scandinavian Scenes' for pianoforte and violin, composed by Mr. Grainger. The violinist's rendering of M. Saint-Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccio' is especially worthy of praise. Mr. Clutsam accompanied most of the songs.

Much interest pertained to Miss Winifred Christie's orchestral concert on June 21 at St. James's Hall, for the young artist has been studying for the past five years at the Royal Academy of Music, where she has been a pianoforte pupil of Mr. Oscar Beringer and succeeded in gaining the Liszt Scholarship. Miss Christie's attainments may be surmised from the fact that she elected to be heard in the Pianoforte Concertos of Beethoven in G and Tschaiikovsky in B flat minor, and in Liszt's 'Hungarian' Fantasia. The young artist was most successful in Beethoven's work, in which her pure, sympathetic and legitimate style was heard to the greatest advantage. At present Miss Christie's readings of vigorous passages are deficient in boldness, but in other respects her playing is most pleasure-giving. The orchestra was conducted by Dr. Cowen, who secured effective support to the concert-giver, and an excellent performance of his vivacious Overture 'The Butterfly's Ball.' The beautiful singing of Miss Muriel Foster further increased the enjoyment of the large audience.

Mr. Joseph Holbrooke's series of 'Modern Chamber Concerts' well merit generous support, for they give a hearing to the works of British composers. Perhaps it is scarcely wise to give an entire programme of novelties, as the strain on the attention is too great. At the concert given on June 8, the selection opened with a Pianoforte Quintet in E flat by Mr. Joseph Speaight, which contained a strong and well-knit first movement. A set of Six Lyrical Pieces for String Quartet, by Mr. Richard H. Walthew, is worthy of the attention of amateurs; but the best work brought forward was a String Sextet (Op. 16) by Mr. Holbrooke himself—a terse, bright, and interesting composition, which merits publication. There were several new songs, amongst which 'When you come' and 'Bonjour,' by Mr. Norman O'Neill, proved to be charming as rendered by Mrs. Henry J. Wood.

A large and fashionable audience, which included the Princess Christian and the Duchess of Connaught, attended M. Johannes Wolff's concert on June 10, at the Æolian Hall. The popular violinist received valuable assistance from M. Saint-Saëns, who was represented in the programme by four compositions, and who took part with M. Wolff in the Second Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte, the violinist in this work showing his appreciation of the composer's intentions. The French master also accompanied Miss Ada Crossley in two of his songs, and played the organ part in his Romance for Violin with accompaniment for that instrument, the pianoforte part being played by Mr. F. A. Sewell. M. Saint-Saëns also contributed a Prelude and Fugue composed by himself. It should be added that Miss Ada Crossley sang with her usual charm.

Mr. David Bispham's vocal recital at St. James's Hall on June 13 was attended by a large and appreciative audience. The singer was most successful in his rendering of Loewe's weird ballad 'Edward,' and Hugo Wolf's charming song 'Auf dem grünen Balcon' and Richard Strauss's expressive 'Sehnsucht' were also most expressively sung. Mr. David Bispham introduced two new songs severally entitled 'To Dafodils,' and 'Star of my Night,' composed by Madame Dora Bright, who accompanied the singer. The words of the latter, by the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, are set in the gifted composer's most earnest manner, the accompaniment being a study in itself. The 'Pirate song,' by Mr. H. F. Gilbert, and 'Lady Moon,' by Mr. Arthur Bruhns, also merit record.

Miss Sybil Keymer, yet another child violinist, gave her first recital at St. James's Hall on June 9. Previously to this it may be remembered she had been heard at a Stock Exchange concert at Queen's Hall. That she is remarkably gifted is unquestionable, but she is too young to appear in public. Her playing of Mendelssohn's Concerto was remarkably fluent for a performer of such tender years, and in other pieces she showed great executive ability. The newly-constructed Queen's Hall Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. Wood, gave an excellent account of itself.

Miss Winifred Robinson imparted distinction to her concert on June 3, at Bechstein Hall, by giving the first performance in London of Borodin's String Quartet in A. The work, dating from 1875, was arranged by the composer as a pianoforte duet, in which form it was first published. The first two movements are over-developed, but the principal themes are expressive. The scherzo is bright, but the finale is the strongest and most characteristic section of the Quartet. The executants were Misses Winifred Robinson, Amy Inglis, Sybil Maturin and Dorothy Densham, whose playing was crisp and intelligent. The finished singing of Miss Beatrice Spencer formed a pleasing feature of the afternoon's music.

Master Vecsey has now given seven violin recitals, at each and all of which he has proved himself to be a wonder-child. All that was said about him in these columns last month must be fully confirmed. On July 2, at Queen's Hall, the little fiddler is to make his first appearance (in England) with the orchestra. A word of praise is the just due of Herr Alfred Schmidt-Badekow, who has not only accompanied Vecsey with true artistic restraint, but has contributed some acceptable pianoforte solos.

Mrs. Norman O'Neill included in the programme of her pianoforte recital at Æolian Hall on June 11, a set of Variations on an Irish folk-tune for two pianofortes, by her husband. It proved to be a remarkable composition. The tune is a fine example of its class, and the Variations are masterly. The Variations were admirably played by Miss Fanny Davies and Mrs. O'Neill, and should attract the attention of professional pianists.

Amongst numerous concerts which, although excellent, do not call for detailed criticism are Mdlle. Szalit's pianoforte recital at Bechstein Hall on June 6, Herr Kubelik's violin recital at Queen's Hall on June 11, Madame Nora Clench's concert at Æolian Hall on June 13, and Mr. Dolmetsch's 100th concert of 'Antient Musick' on June 15 at Clifford's Inn.

The concert given by the Vienna Male-voice Choir is noticed on page 444.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The close of the session of the School of Music connected with the Birmingham and Midland Institute was marked by a series of performances which afforded evidence of good work done during the year. At the concert of chamber music given on June 11 the programme comprised Beethoven's String Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2), and Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 16), arranged from the Quintet for Pianoforte and Wind Instruments; and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 44). Some dozen students took part in the very creditable rendering of these pieces. In addition, Maurer's Concertante for four Solo Violins (with pianoforte) was brightly given by the Misses Wadeley, Hodgkinson, Burman, and Fuller; Miss K. G. Thomas played a Suite Poétique by René de Boisdeffre, and Mr. H. Caville gave a brilliant rendering of Rode's Seventh Violin Concerto. The pianists were Mrs. Charles Gaunt and Mr. G. H. Mantion, the latter a young professor of the Institute. On June 15 the Choral and Orchestral Concert took place in the Town Hall. The Students' Choir (Ladies) sang Berlioz's Ballad 'Ophelia' (from 'Tristia,' Op. 18), a chorus from Gaul's 'The Ten Virgins,' and Mackenzie's 'Come, sisters, come.' Mr. Gaul conducted the performance of his music, and had a great reception. The orchestra, mainly composed of students, but aided by professional players in some departments, gave an admirable rendering of Elgar's 'Froissart' Overture, and accompanied the choral and solo numbers. Miss Winifred Morris created something like a sensation by her interpretation of the solo part of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, showing extraordinary promise. Mr. P. L. Dyche, a young violoncellist, gave a good account of Max Bruch's 'Kol Nidrei,' playing with good tone and neat execution.

The prize song from 'Die Meistersinger' was tastefully given by Mr. W. J. Ottery. Mr. Granville Bantock conducted.

In the lecture theatre of the Institute, on June 18, the concluding function took place. It was a performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus' with all stage accessories. The opera was beautifully mounted, and the well-drilled chorus sang splendidly. The principals were Miss Eva Dickinson, Orpheus; Miss Daisy Hoskins, Euridice; and Miss Estelle Lermite, Amor. All did well, but the representative of the titular part deserves special praise. The whole was the finest display yet given by the School, and it was fully appreciated by the large audience. Mr. Bantock conducted with masterly skill.

The musical matinées at the Society of Artists came to a conclusion on June 11, and Mr. Oscar Pollack began a series of concerts the same evening in the Exhibition Hall of the Botanical Gardens. At the matinée Mr. William Sewell's male-voice choir gave several pieces, and Mr. Sewell's Ladies' Choir appeared at the evening concert.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Under the auspices of the National Literary Society and the Moore Memorial Committee, a concert was given at the Royal University Hall on May 28 in memory of the poet Thomas Moore. The programme consisted entirely of those Irish melodies which are indissolubly connected with the name of our national poet. Mr. Plunket Greene was the particular attraction of the evening, the other artists taking part in the concert being Madame Cosslett-Heller, Miss Agnes Treacy, Mr. J. Walsh, Mr. J. C. Doyle, Miss Mabel Love (violinist), and Miss Annie Lord (pianist). Madame Cosslett-Heller's Irish Ladies' Choir and Mr. Vincent O'Brien's Choir also assisted. The object of the concert was to provide funds for the proposed restoration of the poet's grave, and to place thereupon a suitable monument. As the hall was filled to its utmost capacity, a large sum must have been gained for this purpose.

On June 8 the University of Dublin Choral Society gave their final concert for the season in the Examination Hall of Trinity College. The Society, which is entirely amateur,—with the exception of a few members of the orchestra—gave a very satisfactory rendering of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha,' under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Marchant. Mr. Dan Jones (tenor), Mr. John Horan, Jun. (baritone), and a lady member of the Society, were the soloists.

MUSIC IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The stage of the Tyne Theatre was in the possession of the Newcastle Amateur Operatic Society during the week beginning June 6, when adequate and creditable performances were given of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas, 'Trial by Jury' and 'H.M.S. Pinafore.' Madame Mimi Beers, Misses Elsie Downing, Margaret Herries, and May West, and Messrs. Maurice Pearce, W. D. Spark, G. K. Vietch, J. R. Liddell, E. J. Potts, W. E. Storey, and R. Pearson were entrusted with the principal characters, and Mr. R. Smith conducted.

One does not usually expect good music to receive much attention at popular seaside resorts, therefore it is very pleasant to note that at the Tynemouth Palace-by-the-Sea variety entertainments do not entirely exclude more serious interests. With an orchestra of thirty-five performers, Handel, Wagner and Gounod evenings were recently given, and Beethoven's Fifth and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony were included in other programmes. It is to be hoped that this may lead to further developments in the same artistic direction.

A successful pianoforte recital was given in Sunderland on June 13 by Mr. Henley Pratt, organist of St. George's Presbyterian Church. The recitalist was assisted by Mrs. Alfred Wall and Mr. Alexander Webster (vocalists), and Mr. Alfred Wall (violinist).

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The principal concert of this term was that given by Dr. Joachim and his colleagues Messrs. Halir, Wirth, and Hausmann, in the Town Hall on May 4, when the programme consisted of Brahms's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2), Haydn's Quartet in E major (Op. 54, No. 3), and Schubert's Quintet in C major (Op. 163), the second violoncello part in the last-named work being played by Mr. Percy Such. It is hardly necessary to say that the performance of the whole programme was most artistic.

The first concert of the "Eights" took place in Balliol College Hall on May 21, Miss Fanny Davies being the pianist, Herr and Frau Dulong the vocalists, and Dr. Walker accompanist. Among the pieces charmingly played by Miss Davies were the two Canons in A flat and B minor by Schumann, and Bach's A minor Fugue. She also played several pieces by the older Netherland writers. Several Swiss folk-songs were nicely rendered by the two singers.

The Exeter College Concert took place on May 24, the most important items being Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture and Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, excellently given by the band under Mr. J. S. Heap's direction. Miss Bridson played in good style Paganini's Violin Concerto in D minor, and amongst the songs given by Mr. Charles Saunders was 'Why beats with rapturous thrill?' from the cantata 'Maid of Astolat,' by the late Dr. Swinnerton Heap, father of the conductor of the concert.

The Keble Concert on May 26 again consisted chiefly of songs and part-songs interspersed with orchestral pieces. Miss Beatrice Dunn and Mr. McInnes were the soloists, the former being very successful in 'Mignon's Song' by Goring Thomas, and the latter in 'Boot, saddle, to horse and away,' by Graham Peel. A thoroughly excellent rendering of Weber's 'Oberon' Overture was given under the baton of Mr. F. Shaw.

The Queens' College Concert followed the next evening, when a new cantata for men's voices, 'Mucius Scaevola,' composed by Dr. H. A. Harding, was given with orchestral accompaniment. The two solo parts of Mucius and Porsenna were well sustained by Mr. J. Reed (tenor) and Mr. A. Kerry (bass). The cantata, though very difficult in places, proved a well-written work. In the second part of the programme mention should be made of a fine rendering by the orchestra of Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' Overture under Dr. Iliffe's baton, in which the band worked 'with a will' to give it an adequate rendering. Purcell's 'Knotting Song' was charmingly sung by Mr. Reed, and a dainty part-song, 'Cupid and Campaspe,' written by Mr. R. F. Dale, was excellently rendered. It should be added that Mr. Dale has been a member of the Queens' Society for upwards of forty years.

On June 8 in the Sheldonian the Professor of Music, Sir Hubert Parry, lectured upon 'Types of Audience and their Influence,' being a continuation of his previous discourse on the same subject. The audience—though not so large as it ought to have been—was very appreciative and enthusiastic, and evidently took great interest in the way our genial Professor always handles his subject.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A special performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given by the Sheffield Musical Union on May 31, in aid of the Sheffield University Women's Endowment Fund. Anything appertaining to the popular University scheme just now finds a sympathetic response, and the Albert Hall was well filled. The prestige of the Musical Union and Dr. Coward, its enthusiastic chief, added further attraction to the event. Musically, too, the concert was a complete success. So well had the choir been prepared for its London appearance that a single rehearsal sufficed for this fresh interpretation of Sir Edward Elgar's music. The chorists were in fine form, the histrionics of the demon chorus and the beauty and grandeur of 'Praise to the Holiest' once more thrilling and moving the large audience; but the chief choral success was won in the exquisite 'Be merciful, be gracious.' The Sheffield orchestra gave an admirable performance of the intricate score. In the second part of the programme, Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' was finely sung. The soloists were Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Joseph Lycett. The first and last named contributed songs, to the accompaniment of Mr. J. A. Rodgers. Dr. Coward conducted with care and judgment, and Mr. W. S. Jessop rendered excellent service at the organ.

Among the other musical doings of the past month have been a well prepared and impressive performance of Maunders's 'Olivet to Calvary,' under the direction of Mr. J. W. Ibberson, at Fulwood Wesleyan Chapel, and a capital performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' at Abbeydale Congregational Church on June 12, admirably given under Mr. Harold E. Tuck.

Mr. Henry J. Wood has accepted the conductorship of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society in succession to Mr. F. Schöllhammer who has resigned, after having rendered excellent service in that capacity for thirty-five years. Mr. J. A. Rodgers has been appointed deputy conductor, and Mr. J. W. Phillips retains the office of organist and accompanist.

Foreign Notes.

BERNE.

The fifth gathering of Swiss composers was announced for June 25 and 26. Three concerts were to be given: one of orchestral, a second of chamber, and the last of choral music, the programmes to be devoted entirely to Swiss composers, among whom were J. Lauber, Hans Huber, Volkmar Andree, Georg Haeser, Henri Marteau, Fritz Niggli, E. Munzinger, F. Hegar, and F. Klose.

BEZIERS.

Gluck's 'Armide' is announced to be given in the ancient theatre at Orange on August 28 and 29.

BOLOGNA.

The Liceo Musicale, one of the most important institutions in Italy, was founded in 1804. Mattei was its first professor in counterpoint, and among his pupils were Rossini, Morlacchi, and Donizetti. The city intends worthily to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the foundation, and a special commission has been appointed to formulate a scheme. The Liceo possesses, by-the-way, a rich library of autographs, rare books, and ancient instruments.

BRESCIA.

Signor Puccini's 'Madame Butterfly' was withdrawn by the composer after its failure at La Scala. It has now been given here, and according to all accounts was received with enthusiasm. Madame Kruseniski appeared in the title-role. The composer has made radical changes in the work.

DETMOLD.

The monument to Lortzing was unveiled in the Theatre Square on June 9. The ceremony commenced with the composer's Festival Overture, and in the evening a performance of his 'Czar und Zimmermann' was given at the theatre.

DRESDEN.

The Mozart Society recently offered 20,000 marks for a monument to Mozart in the form of a fountain with three female figures typifying Earnestness, Grace, and Geniality—qualities which eminently characterize the creations of the great master. None however of the designs sent in met with approval. The monument has now been entrusted to Hermann Hosäus, of Charlottenburg.

GRAZ.

The castle of St. Johann, purchased in 1895 by Frau Amalie Friedrich Materna (the first Brünnhilde) for the sum of £3,800, was sold by auction on May 28, when it was acquired by Frau Hedwig Beer for £1,700!

MUNICH.

Herr Felix Mottl, who has been appointed royal Bavarian general music-director, enters upon his duties on October 1. Meanwhile as 'Gast' he conducted a performance of 'Die Meistersinger' on May 29 with brilliant success.—A committee has been formed with Herr von Perfall as president, to arrange for a tablet, worthy of the composer, to be placed on the birth-house of the late Joseph Rheinberger. Professor Erdmannsdorfer, Dr. A. Sandberger, Herr Ludwig Thuille are among the members of the committee. An appeal will be made to various societies and to the numerous pupils of Rheinberger to assist in thus honouring his memory.

PARIS.

A statue of César Franck will shortly be unveiled here, the work of the sculptor M. Alfred Lenoir. It will face the church of St. Clotilde, of which the gifted composer was for many years organist.—At the Grand Opéra the score has been discovered of 'Don Sanche,' an opera in one act, composed by Liszt at the age of fourteen, and produced there on October 17, 1825. The work was supposed to have been destroyed in the fire of 1873. The music of 'Don Sanche' is of little or no value, but the opera is an interesting relic of the great pianist.—Gluck's 'Alceste' has been revived at the Opéra Comique, and with great success, with Madame Litvinne in the title-role, M. Beyle as Admète, and M. Luigini as chef d'orchestre.—'Armide' is to be given next season at the Opéra, with Madame L. Bréval as Armide and M. Alvarez as Renaud.

PRAGUE.

A cycle of the late Antonín Dvořák's stage works is to be given here, and by way of conclusion the composer's 'Requiem,' produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1891, will be performed.—Herr Karl Knittl has been appointed Dvořák's successor as director of the Conservatoire.

ST. PETERSBURG.

June 1 was the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Michael Glinka, the great national Russian composer whose 'Life for the Czar' won for him universal popularity in his own country and high esteem abroad. The anniversary was to have been celebrated with special pomp in this capital, but owing to the war in the far east the commemorative festival, by order of the Czar, has been postponed.

As a gratifying result of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's visit to Canada last year the choir formed for that occasion at Brandon (Manitoba) gave a Festival on June 1 and 2. The chief feature of the programme on the first evening was Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' which was admirably sung, the splendid tone of the choir, and their attack and alert response to the conductor being particularly noticeable. On the second evening Cowen's 'Rose Maiden' was given with no less ability, and Mr. F. B. Fenwick who conducted is to be heartily congratulated on the successful result of his efforts as choir-trainer. There was an excellent orchestra led by Herr Carl Reidelsberger, and the able solo vocalists who assisted and contributed to the miscellaneous part of the programmes were Miss Clara Williams, Mrs. Alma Johnson Porteous, Mr. Alvin Davies, and Mr. Harry Phillips. The good seed sown by Sir Alexander Mackenzie last spring has thus speedily borne fruit in the most satisfactory manner.

The London Sunday School Choir gave their usual summer concert at the Crystal Palace on June 22, and met with the customary success. The children's concert, given by a choir of 5,000 singers under Mr. Rowley, much pleased the audience. Later in the day the adult choir sang under the skilful direction of Mr. Whiteman. The programme included Cooke's 'Strike the lyre,' Jackson's 'O the flow'ry month of June,' Sullivan's 'I will mention,' and other pieces, all of which were effectively performed. An orchestra, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Davis, played some selections and strengthened the accompaniments.

Mr. H. G. Holmes was the organist. There was also a choral competition for a challenge shield. Five choirs competed, and the prize was awarded by Dr. Turpin to the Willesden District Choir, conducted by Mr. J. S. Waddell.

The forty-seventh annual Festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was held on June 18 at the Crystal Palace with the customary success which has so long attended these gatherings. At the first of two gigantic concerts, a choir of young folk, 5,000 strong, was conducted by Mr. S. Filmer Rook, while later in the day the adult singers, under the experienced direction of Mr. Leonard C. Venables, gave a good account of themselves in Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and other pieces with and without orchestral accompaniment. Miss Nannie Tout sang the solos in the Psalm and gave an excellent interpretation of Weber's 'Softly Sighs,' and Mr. C. Hugh Rowcliffe rendered good service at the organ.

The annual Festival of Church Sunday Schools took place at the Crystal Palace on May 28, when a varied programme of music was sung by a juvenile choir of 5,000 voices, conducted by Mr. R. J. Mines, with Mr. F. W. Belchamber at the organ.

The St. Michael's Choral Society gave their fourth annual concert at the Marlborough Rooms on June 2, under the able direction of Miss Old, who also contributed two solos. The choir and orchestra were fully efficient.

His Majesty the King has been pleased to confer the Royal Victorian Order on Dr. Hans Richter in token of the great and invaluable services, extending over very many years, rendered by him to musical art in all countries.

Dr. Henry Hiles has been appointed Principal of the Virgil Piano School. In that capacity he will give a series of twelve lectures upon music during the month of August.

Messrs. Challen and Son have acquired the patent rights in the 'Ardeon Piano, or perfect practice clavier,' to which we called attention in our April issue.

Herr Wilhelm Backhaus has been appointed a professor of the pianoforte at the Royal Manchester College of Music.

In the article on Winchester College in the June issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES two regrettable errors have to be corrected owing to the waywardness of a proof. The name of the assistant-master of music is Mr. H. V. Jervis-Read (p. 369, col. 2). In the descriptions of the view on p. 365, for 'Science Schools,' read 'The Memorial Buildings.' The building on the extreme left of the picture is 'Sick House.'

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

BEDFORD.—Dr. Harding's dramatic cantata 'Mucius Scaevola' was recently performed by the Musical Society in the Corn Exchange, with full orchestra and chorus (numbering 250 performers), under the direction of the composer. The members of the Society have presented Dr. Harding with a handsome solid silver tea service in commemoration of the production.

CHELMSFORD.—The Chelmsford Association of Church Choirs held their annual festival service at St. Mary's Church on June 14. There were about 300 vocalists. Good quality of voices, good tone, and tasteful expression were noticeable throughout the service, which included Sir Hubert Parry's Service in D and Dr. Eaton Fanning's anthem 'O how amiable.' Dr. G. F. Huntley presided at the organ, and Mr. F. R. Frye (choirmaster to the Association) conducted a successful service.

CROMER.—The Musical Society gave their second concert this season on June 14 in the Town Hall. The miscellaneous programme included the choruses Schumann's 'Gipsy Life,' 'Hymn to Diana' (Thouless), 'Ye Mariners of England' (Pierson), and Mendelssohn's part-song 'Early Spring.' The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Potter, who was specially successful, Mr. Martin Pierce, and Mr. Elliot Hooper; and Mr. E. Lake contributed clarinet solos. Mr. Ernest Harcourt conducted.

GILMORTON.—Mr. Bruce Steane's sacred cantata the 'Ascension' was successfully given (for the first time in the district of Leicester) in All Saints' Church on June 9. The choruses were excellently sung, and mention should be made of the efforts of Miss Ada Preston, who rendered valuable service in training the sopranos in the choral work. Mr. H. Matthews was the conductor.

RIPON.—The annual concert at the Diocesan Training College took place in the Common Room on June 3, when the College Choir, augmented by some male voices from the Cathedral and the Choral Society, gave a finished rendering of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Somervell's 'The Power of Sound.' The accompaniments were adequately played by a professional orchestra, and Mr. C. H. Moody, Cathedral organist and lecturer in the College, conducted.

Answers to Correspondents.

E. S.—(1) The late Herr Carl Oberthür, the distinguished harpist, was born at Munich, March 4, 1819, and died in London—where he settled in the year 1844—on November 8, 1895. He was a pupil of Elise Brauchle and G. V. Roeder. For a time he played in the orchestra, under Costa, at Covent Garden, but he achieved fame as a teacher and by his solo performances at concerts both in England and abroad. His compositions (upwards of 200 in number) included an opera 'Florio von Namur' (produced with success at Wiesbaden); a Grand Mass 'St. Philip de Neri'; Overtures 'Macbeth' and 'Rübezahl'; trios for harp, violin and violoncello; 'Loreley,' a legend for harp and orchestra; a quartet for four harps; and a vast number of original compositions and arrangements for his own instrument. (2) The harp compositions of Hasselmann and Verdaile can be obtained of Messrs. Novello.

C. F.—Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' is an English version of his oratorio 'Christus am Oelberge.' The word 'Hallelujah' does not occur in the original (German) version of the noble chorus in C, but it is thoroughly Halleluic in sentiment. The work was first performed in this country on February 25, 1814, under the direction of Sir George Smart, at one of the Lenten oratorio performances at Drury Lane Theatre. There are, or have been, several English versions of the text: by Arnold (?), Oliphant, Bartholomew, and Troutbeck; also by Dr. Hudson, of Dublin, in 1842, in which the story is changed to that of David, and the title to 'Engedi.'

LEIGH.—A teaching connection is generally made rather than bought. Of course if you obtained a church organ appointment such a post might bring you work in pianoforte tuition; but as you have so good a qualification as the Licentiatehip of the Royal Academy of Music, 'have done a good deal of teaching away from home, prepared successfully for examinations, have splendid testimonials and press notices for concert work,' you are surely on the right track for making a teaching connection. Go steadily on, putting plenty of enthusiasm in your work, and in due time you will reap the reward of well-doing. Be wary of agents.

J. C. C.—Thomas Clark is said to have been born in Canterbury, though there is no confirmation thereof. But he died in that city (on May 30, 1859, aged eighty-four), where he had acted as leader of psalmody at the Wesleyan Chapel and afterwards of the Unitarian Chapel—he was certainly not organist of the Cathedral. A prolific (amateur) composer of hymn-tunes, he issued over twenty sets in different forms. These tunes would now be regarded as 'old-fashioned.'

H. A.—It is, we fear, impossible to say when Mozart's three great Symphonies (in E flat, G minor, and C major) were first performed in England. Even a prolonged search among the files of old London newspapers (advertisements) at the British Museum might be fruitless in result. It must be a long time ago that they were 'neglected' in this country—a century at least. We hope soon to print in THE MUSICAL TIMES one or more of the late Sir George Grove's analyses of this splendid trio of Symphonies.

J. A. J.—Your inquiry as to the probable success of an invention for turning over leaves of music is one that should be addressed to a firm who deal in such things. If you could prove your statement that the little machine could be produced at half-a-guinea and sold at a guinea, and that the public could not do without it, there would not be wanting those who would be willing to pocket unlimited half-guineas by way of profit.

DETTA.—We are not aware of any 'particular method of pianoforte playing' at the institution you name; each professor follows his own plan, and his work and that of his pupils is judged by results. 'Doctors differ' even in the teaching of instruments, and who shall decide? Mr. Matthey's book 'The Act of Touch' will give you unlimited food for thought.

R. R. H.—Your better plan would be to ask the author of the book in question how he reconciles 'two flatly contradictory statements of opinion'; though you must bear in mind that one of those opinions is that of the author himself, while the other is the opinion of someone else. Under these circumstances we may be excused from giving an opinion.

J. S. F.—Settings of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's poems other than by the composers you mention are 'Hymn before action' (also arranged for two tenors and two basses), by H. Walford Davies; 'Follow me 'ome,' by M. F. Bell; and 'The Flag of England,' for soprano solo and chorus, by Sir Frederick Bridge.

H. T. T.—Your requirement of a small table instrument for 'guidance in tuning chime tunes' might be met by the purchase of a Metalophone. This instrument (of metal plates) is made in various sizes, ranging from eight to fifteen notes. It can be supplied, at a cost of a few shillings, by Messrs. Metzler and Co., Great Marlborough Street.

L. R. A. M.—With pleasure. In Loeschorn's pianoforte study in C sharp minor (Op. 195), bar 18, the last note but one in the bass is A natural. The natural sign has been prefixed to the lower A; but it would have been safer to contradict the sharp sign of the upper note, that which you question.

MARGUERITE.—We cannot differentiate between the standards of examination for musical degrees in various Universities. Moreover, we cannot give the reason why ladies are not permitted to take degrees at Oxford. Some people think the prohibition unreasonable, but —!

H. P.—The most complete account of 'Adeste Fideles,' the words and music, is that contained in 'The Music of the Church Hymnary' by Messrs. William Cowan and James Love (Henry Frowde). The history of this tune still, however, remains very obscure.

QUAVER.—The term 'heavy' associated with vocalists is not of avoidupois application. A man may be a light tenor and yet make serious demands upon a weighing-machine, while a very thin member of the community might come under the designation of a heavy bass.

MARTHA.—You ask us to 'name one or two pianoforte pieces published at four shillings suitable as a pupil's first piece.' We venture to think you have named too high a price.

G. H.—The Rheinische Musik und Theaterzeitung is a musical journal published at Cologne. The office is at Stolkgrasse 27. You would probably be able to subscribe for it to be sent regularly.

GAMBA.—Thanks, but we have not space, much less inclination, to take up controversial matters.

A correspondent writes: 'A book on the Schumann method of pianoforte teaching is that entitled "Hints on tone and technique" by Madame Amina Goodwin.'

GIACOMO CARISSIMI

WITH LATIN AND ENGLISH TEXT

THE LATTER VERSION BY THE REV. DR. TROUTBECK.

Price One Shilling.

Carissimi wrote good music always—music which would have been pleasant enough to listen to for its own sake, but which became infinitely more interesting when used as a vehicle for the expression of all those tender shades of joy and sorrow which make up the sum of what is usually called human passion. His refined taste and graceful manner enabled him to do this so successfully that he soon outshone all his contemporaries, who looked upon him as a model of artistic excellence.

MY FIRST PIANO LESSONS

BY

AGNES HONORIA LEEDS,

LICENTIATE OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

108 pp. Oblong Folio, profusely illustrated in colours, bound in coloured paper board covers, cloth back, price 7s. 6d.

"MY FIRST PIANO LESSONS" is a book which appeals to the minds of children between the ages of four and eight. Knowing the love which these little folks have for pictures, and the educational value of pictorial aids in imparting knowledge to those of tender years, the author has embodied in the present work a system of teaching notation by means of illustrations of familiar objects, a method which she has employed for many years with the greatest success. The scheme is entirely systematic and progressive, and by its means the child-pupil is led to form an actual friendship with the individual notes.

With regard to the value of notes, the method followed is that of grouping them into one FAMILY—the members of which become personally known to the pupil—the value of each note being clearly indicated by its degree of family relationship. Thus we have "Mr. Semibreve, Mrs. Minim, Master Crotchet, Miss Quaver, Master Semiquaver, and Baby Demisemiquaver." Furthermore, the child is initiated in a Game of Exchanging Notes, according to the respective values of the various notes.

The book also contains Elementary Ear Exercises and a special chapter is devoted to Signs and Ornaments. Other sections are Scales in One Octave, Easy Sight-reading Exercises, Easy Finger Exercises, together with little Solos, and Duets for Teacher and Pupil, and for little Pupils by themselves.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

An admirably got up little book, cleverly illustrated in colours, and entitled "My first Piano Lessons," would make a welcome present for children commencing their music studies. The author, Agnes Honoria Leeds, evidently understands the art of interesting the young people.

YORKSHIRE POST.

An ingenious attempt to make the path of very juvenile students less wearisome. . . . With a sympathetic and ready teacher, who takes the trouble to assimilate the method of this book, it may prove of distinct value.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The personalities of the different time values are quaint, and may arrest the attention of the beginner, who could not be made to care for plain crotchets and quavers; and the time-signatures are very clearly explained. Altogether the book is a valuable example of the Kindergarten variety.

LADY'S PICTORIAL.

Happy the child whose music teacher puts into his or her little hands "My First Music Lesson," a book by Miss Agnes Honoria Leeds, L.R.A.M.! It is a delightfully simple and extremely attractive exposition of the elements of music by means of humorous and numerous coloured illustrations and easily understood letterpress. . . . the book may be commended to the attention of all parents and music teachers, as a simple and effective method of teaching children "reading without tears" in music.

THE QUEEN.

The book is compiled with illustrated notes, and makes the learning of music by very young children a delight instead of a toil. . . . The pictures are excellent.

MANCHESTER COURIER.

There are several capital pictures, and the methods suggested are in every particular sound as well as interesting. We have tried the book upon the best judges, some young children, and they are delighted. Most of the accompanying music is by Mr. Hubert Oke, and is well adapted for its purpose.

DUNDEE COURIER.

This is quite a novelty in the way of get up, and is intended for the use of very young children only, so many of whom weary of piano lessons on account of their dullness and dryness. . . . The book, which is beautifully printed and illustrated, will, in the hands of a sympathetic teacher, be the means of eliminating much of the dullness and dryness from first lessons in the pianoforte.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

It is a really wonderful book. The idea is to put the rudiments of pianoforte playing in such an attractive way that the youngest beginner cannot find the lessons dull or dry in the least. . . . The little ones would go to this book as eagerly as to any other picture book, and get over all the drudgery quite imperceptibly. At the same time they would learn to love music instead of hating it as so often happens. It is a clever invention, and the gain to the cause of music will be very great.

CHRISTIAN WORLD.

Miss Agnes H. Leeds, L.R.A.M., has evolved a method by which the necessary instruction is imparted through the agency of bright-coloured illustrations and little rhymes and stories. . . . Teachers, who usually find these preliminary lessons as irksome as do their pupils, will welcome this ingenious plan of imparting the names of the notes and their time values to the mind of the child.

SCHOOL GUARDIAN.

This book is an attractive and ingenious adaptation of the use of coloured pictures for teaching the rudiments of music to very young children. It is, we think, certain of a cordial welcome in many homes and schools, and is well calculated to relieve, if not to get rid of, the tedium and dryness of the first lessons on the pianoforte. Its "production" is worthy of the high reputation of Messrs. Novello in the musical world. We commend the work to the notice of parents and teachers generally.

THE PARENTS' REVIEW.

The author has certainly succeeded in producing, as the result of her very wide experience, an entertaining and probably effectual way of introducing children to the mysteries of "Mr. Crotchet," "Miss Quaver," and the like.

THE BOOKSELLER.

The little ones are sure to be attracted by the striking cover and clever and humorous coloured illustrations, and the book should be found a very useful aid in interesting a child in the beginnings of musical knowledge—no easy first step.

THE TEACHER.

In this handsome book, the writer, herself a gifted teacher, weaves a species of family story around the notes, names, values and positions on the staves. . . . The illustrations are strikingly and beautifully drawn and coloured, the value of the book for teaching purposes being augmented by a series of tuneful duets and solos, which little fingers will have no difficulty in playing.

RUTH

A HARVEST PASTORAL

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY
ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventual episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

A NEW HARVEST CANTATA

By DR. FERRIS TOZER.

. We most strongly recommend this Cantata to all in search of a good and popular work for a Harvest Festival. The libretto (by the late Rev. SAMUEL BARBER) is founded on a most interesting analogy which is well conceived and well carried out, and we venture to say that there is not one dull page in the music, from the solemn opening "The earth was without form and void" to the triumphant and inspiring conclusion "And He shall reign for ever and ever."

A Specimen Copy will be sent to any Clergyman or Choirmaster (giving name of church) for six stamps.

OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC

EDITED BY
JOHN E. WEST.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The Organ Music of the older English composers has for some years been much neglected, owing chiefly to its slight texture and the antiquated character of its registering, which make a literal performance of it unsuited to organs of the present day.

Some of it, however, is too good to be allowed to fall into oblivion. The character of its general outline is in no way destroyed by a judicious modification of details to suit modern requirements.

Probably some of the "filling in" which the thinness of certain passages now seems to demand was actually intended in performance.

The object of the present series is to provide a selection of the best of these pieces, adapted only so far as necessary to make them practicable and effective on modern organs.

TECHNIQUE

AND

IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

"Mr. W. H. Reed, a violinist-member of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, who met with an extremely hearty reception after the first performance of his 'Suite Venitienne' at the Promenade Concerts last night, quite defies our criticism by his fearlessness in writing tunes and by the cheerfulness and brightness of his work. For Mr. Reed and his music there is no need of the cheap philosophy which does duty so easily for the 'poetical basis' of so much of our young composers' music. He writes as he feels, evidently; and he writes not only well but sincerely. Small wonder, then, that his suite captivated a very large audience, which recalled him again and again. His suite is not strikingly original. But it is fresh and cheery, unpretentious and clear, and, above all, healthy-minded. . . . In the presentment of his ideas Mr. Reed shows almost a master-hand—largely owing, no doubt, to the fact of his being a member of an orchestra; and in as great a degree as is possible his scoring, admirable and rich and full as it is, compensates for a lack of distinct originality in his thematic material. In any case, however, his suite deserves high rank among the novelties that have been produced this season at these admirable concerts."—The Times.

SONG

THE POEM WRITTEN BY

ERIC MACKAY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR

(Op. 37, No. 6).

"The second novelty was a tenor song, 'Eléanore,' a recent composition by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. It has melody of an expressive and thoroughly vocal character, and the orchestral colouring is charming if not almost too luscious in effect. Mr. Coates sang it with finished phrasing, and with an expression which was intimate without being in the least overstrained."—Yorkshire Post, April 14, 1904.

PREFACE.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason, the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern, so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The lack of certain well-known hymns in that book and the need of extra hymns for certain occasions are often felt. This is clear from the fact that many supplemental appendixes and leaflets are now used with it, particularly books for mission services, children's use, and other special occasions.

It may be said by many that we already have too many hymns, and that a large number are most unsuitable. There is no subject upon which persons differ more thoroughly than the suitability of different hymns. No two people will ever agree as to all the hymns in any collection. The only way of dealing satisfactorily with this problem seems to be to give a comprehensive compilation, together with guidance as to the character of each hymn. Hence, in the index of first lines a letter has been prefixed to each hymn giving an indication as to its characteristic—whether a hymn of direct praise, a prayer, or sentimental, historical, etc., etc. Those who object to hymns of any particular class can, therefore, easily avoid their use.

Guided by these two principles, hymns have been included for the following reasons:—

1. Hymns which, being in constant request, are inserted, not necessarily because of their merit, but rather because they have been found to be of real use in many cases.
2. Since the formation of other hymn books, much greater prominence has been given to music in connection with Choral Celebrations, and with this has grown a want of more hymns, especially short ones of one or two verses for different parts of the service.
3. So also has there grown a demand for further hymns on Allsinging, for Processionals of a greater length than usual, for Harvest, Flower, and Mission Services, besides other special occasions.
4. Finally, it is felt by very many to be a mistake to accustom children to the use of a Children's hymn book which will be discarded when they have grown older. Far better is it to accustom them at once, when young, to love the hymn book which they will use in after life. For this purpose a few more children's hymns than are supplied in other books seem to be wanted.

FREDERICK ILIFFE
M.A., Mus. Doc., OXON.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"The object of the present analysis is to place in the hands of students a detailed and exhaustive scheme of every Prelude and Fugue. In the Preludes the mode of procedure has been: (1) To give the Figure upon which each Prelude is built; (2) to give the Prelude itself in full and copiously marked, or in a reduced form showing the structure; (3) a 'Summary' of the piece; and lastly, general 'Remarks' upon the structure and treatment of the materials. For the Fugues a Tabulated Analysis—bar by bar—is first given, then a 'Summary'
and 'Remarks' as before."

AND HIS

NINE SYMPHONIES

BY

GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

PRICE, CLOTH, GILT, SIX SHILLINGS.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.

"This is a good and effective setting—there is nothing which smacks of difficulty merely for difficulty's sake, and though a trained choir is of course needed to do it full justice, yet it would sound well with a choir of even moderate pretensions."—Oxford Times, Dec., 1903.

THE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES AT MORNING AND
EVENING PRAYER

SET TO APPROPRIATE CHANTS

FERIAL AND FESTAL RESPONSES, LITANY,
RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS, FINAL AMENS,
VESPER HYMNS AND VESTRY PRAYERS

TOGETHER WITH

ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENTS TO THE LORD'S PRAYER,
APOSTLES' AND NICENE CREEDS.

The Canticles, with the Cathedral Psalter Pointing, have been set to appropriate Chants by Sir John Stainer, Sir George C. Martin, Sir Joseph Barnby, Sir George Elvey, and other well-known church composers.

The Responses to the Commandments have been selected from the Services of the above composers as well as those of Myles B. Foster, Dr. Garrett, Ch. Gounod, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Merbecke, H. Smart, John E. West, S. S. Wesley, and others.

Sir John Stainer's Sevenfold Amen is also included, as well as Vesper Hymns by Beethoven, Sullivan, and others; concluding with two Vestry Prayers by S. S. Wesley and the Rev. Canon Hervey.

PREFACE.

Organists, choirmasters and librarians of choirs often have occasion to wish for a choral service-book of a comprehensive nature. This desideratum the "Parish Choir Manual" seeks to meet by supplying within one cover the Canticles for Morning and Evening Prayer, Responses (Ferial, Festal, and to the Commandments), Final Amens, Vesper Hymns, and Vestry Prayers, in addition to organ accompaniments to the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

The constant usefulness and the practicability of such a compilation are obvious, and a glance at the names of the composers will assure confidence in a publication that should commend itself for use "in quires and places where they sing."

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY
FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

The present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

THE PARISH CHOIR MANUAL

CONTAINING THE CANTICLES AT MORNING AND EVENING PRAYER
SET TO APPROPRIATE CHANTS
FERIAL AND FESTAL RESPONSES, LITANY, RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS, FINAL AMENS, VESPER HYMNS AND VESTRY PRAYERS
TOGETHER WITH ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENTS TO THE LORD'S PRAYER, APOSTLES' AND NICENE CREEDS.

The Canticles, with the Cathedral Psalter Pointing, have been set to appropriate Chants by Sir John Stainer, Sir George C. Martin, Sir Joseph Barnby, Sir George Elvey, and other well-known church composers.

The Responses to the Commandments have been selected from the Services of the above composers as well as those of Myles B. Foster, Dr. Garrett, Ch. Gounod, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Merbecke, H. Smart, John E. West, S. S. Wesley, and others.

Sir John Stainer's Sevenfold Amen is also included, as well as Vesper Hymns by Beethoven, Sullivan, and others; concluding with two Vestry Prayers by S. S. Wesley and the Rev. Canon Hervey.

PREFACE.

Organists, choirmasters and librarians of choirs often have occasion to wish for a choral service-book of a comprehensive nature. This desideratum the "Parish Choir Manual" seeks to meet by supplying within one cover the Canticles for Morning and Evening Prayer, Responses (Ferial, Festal, and to the Commandments), Final Amens, Vesper Hymns, and Vestry Prayers, in addition to organ accompaniments to the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

The constant usefulness and the practicability of such a compilation are obvious, and a glance at the names of the composers will assure confidence in a publication that should commend itself for use "in quires and places where they sing."

Separately, from the above:

THE RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS. Price 6d.

AUGUST 1, 1904.

THE TERCENTENARY EXHIBITION OF THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

[SECOND ARTICLE.]

This exceedingly interesting Exhibition, opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales on June 27, and held at Fishmongers' Hall, closed its doors on July 16, to the regret of those who derived so much enjoyment and profit from viewing its varied treasures. The word 'unique' can be applied to more than one section of the exhibits. For example, there were to be seen copies of each of the first six music editions of the metrical version of the Psalms, known as Sternhold and Hopkins:—

Geneva, 1556.	Lent by Mrs. Christie Miller, from the Britwell Library.
Geneva, 1558.	„ Mr. J. E. Aylward.
Geneva, 1561.	„ The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral.
London, 1560.	„ Christ Church, Oxford.
London, 1561.	„ The Society of Antiquaries.
London, 1561.	„ Mrs. Christie Miller.

That Geneva was the place of publication of the earliest of these Psalters is due to the fact that the Protestants had taken refuge there during the troubulous times which then agitated England. The title of the first of the above Psalters—that printed at Geneva by John Crespin in 1556—may be given:—

One and fiftie Psalmes of David in Englishe metre, whereof 37 were made by Thomas Sterneholde, and the rest by others. Conferred with the hebrewe, and in certeyn places corrected as the text and sens of the Prophete required.

The chief interest to us in this tiny tome lies in the fact that it contains the first instalment of those reverential old 'Church tunes' which have found a place in the worship-song of the people from that day to this, a period of nearly 350 years. Some of the pious rhymings of Mr. Thomas Sternhold and his metricalizing colleagues strike us as being something more than quaint. A stanza of the 124th Psalm, for example, is quite cannibalistic in its expressiveness. Here it is:—

most proud in roaring noise, Had long ago
overwhelm'd us in the deepe.
But loved be God, which doth us safely keep From bloody teeth, and their most cruell voice,
Which as a prey,
to eat us would rejoyce.

In addition to the foregoing Psalters the case contained the 'Goostly psalmes' of Coverdale (1539?)

AN ITALIAN VIRGINAL OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

exhibited by Queens' College, Oxford; the Crowley Psalter (1549), from Brasenose College, Oxford; and Seager's Psalms (1553), from Emmanuel College, Cambridge. We give the titles of the last two of these rare and ancient books:—

The Psalter of David newly translated into Englysh metre in such sort that it maye the more decently, and wyth more delyte of the mynde, be reade and songe of al men. Whereunto is added a note of four partes, wyth other thynges, as shall appeare in the Epistle to the Readar. Translated and Imprinted by Robert Crowley in the yere of our Lorde. M.D.xlix. the xx. daye of September. And are to be solde in Eley rentes in Holburne.

The 'added note of four partes, wyth other thynges' furnishes a peculiar note to the title-page of this Psalter. The other title reads:—

Certayne Psalmes select out of the Psalter of Dauid, and drawen into Englyshe Metre, with Notes to euery Psalme in iiii parts to Synge, by F. S. Imprinted at London by wylliam Seres, at the sygne of the Hedge Hogge. 1553.

In this Psalter 'drawen into Englyshe Metre' by Mr. Francys Seager—he gives his full name in the dedication to Lord Russell—the music is so arranged that all the four voices may sing from the same book at one time. Each part is printed separately with the words underneath the music notes; and as the music for the two upper voices is on the left-hand page, and that for the lower voices on the opposite leaf, all four singers can turn the page together. One curious feature of these 'Certayne Psalmes' is this: while the music (unbarred) is continuous throughout, the actual number of tunes is only two! one of which is repeated twelve times, the other seven. The subject of the evolution of English Psalmody—from the ancient metrical versions to the modern hymn-tune—is one of great interest. Would that we had a John Stainer to treat it thoroughly!

While in this ecclesiastical vein we naturally turn to a case containing some interesting old documents lent by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. One of these manuscripts—of which we give a facsimile on page 503—contains the only known signature of Orlando Gibbons, who held the organistship of Westminster Abbey from 1623 to 1625. The document shows Gibbons in a new capacity, as a taxing-master of an organ-builder's account. 'I know this bill to be very resonable,' writes the great Orlando, 'for I have already cut him off ten shillings, therefore I pray despatch him, for he hath delt honestly with ye church.' Another organ-building document, dated July 20, 1694, relates to some additions to the Westminster Abbey organ. It contains the signatures of Henry Purcell (organist from 1680 to 1695) and Bernard Smith, better known as Father Smith. The eminent organ artificer contracts to supply for the sum of £200 'a double sett of keys and four new stops,' to be added by 'enlarging the case backwards.' Twenty-four years later Christopher Shrider (as he signs himself) periodically tuned the Abbey organ, for which he received the sum of 'forty shillings p. annum.' He therefore made a 'proposal' to the Dean and Chapter whereby they should allow him 'ten pound for mending and cleaning, and for putting ye said Organ into good order; that being but a small sum for ye Repairs there wanting, and then to fix a salary of five pound p. annum.' (This is dated December 1, 1718). 'I believe this to be true and the proposals very reasonable, is the endorsement on the document by the organist of the Abbey—then a no less distinguished occupant of the organ-loft than Dr. William Croft.

Among a number of interesting documents, portraits, &c., kindly lent by Messrs. Artaria, the well-known music-publishers of Vienna, is a very 'unbuttoned' letter written by Beethoven to 'Sir John Falstaff,' a nickname the jocose composer had given to his friend Ignaz Schuppanzigh, the celebrated violinist. The letter is not one of the best specimens of irreproachable caligraphy even of German characters, but it has been deciphered by that enthusiastic Beethoven scholar, Mr. J. S. Shedlock, who has kindly made the following translation for this article:—

Very best Falstaff,

I should feel obliged by your sending me a copy of each of the two works for pianoforte and flute with variations. As to the receipt, you will receive it to-morrow, so please let me have them without delay.

Please remember me to Artaria, and thank him for his kindness in arranging to pay in advance, but I have received my money from abroad, and therefore need none now.

Farewell, knight Falstaff, don't be too much of a scape-grace; read the Gospel, and reform.

For the rest we are yours most affectionately,
Beethoven.

To Sir John Falstaff, at Messrs. Artaria and Co.

Thayer tells us that Beethoven kept up a singular kind of friendship with Schuppanzigh. So useful were they to each other that their friendship developed into a great mutual liking, if it did not amount to actual affection. A good-looking man, Schuppanzigh became, as the years went on, very stout, hence the Falstaff joke of Beethoven, who once wrote to Graf Brunswick in these words: 'Schuppanzigh is married. They say his wife is as fat as himself. What a family!!' The 'great joker,' as Grove calls Beethoven, found more than one opportunity for practising his 'rough drollery' upon his corpulent friend, Schuppanzigh. On a blank page of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in D (Op. 28), the composer scrawled the following asinine composition:—

IN PRAISE OF THE FAT ONE.

SOLO.

Schup - pan - zigh is . . a scamp, scamp, scamp. Who

O scamp! O donkey!

Turning from Beethoven to Wagner we find the latter master represented by the original text of 'Tristan,' penned in the neatest of hands and in strong contrast to the erratic and almost undecipherable 'pot-hooks and hangers' of Beethoven. A London letter of Wagner's, lent by Lady Cusins and addressed to Mr. G. F. Anderson, then Treasurer of the Philharmonic Society, is of special interest. It is of the year 1855, that memorable season when Wagner conducted the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. In this communication (which we give translated from Wagner's Germanized French) it would seem as if Berlioz did not like to ask for tickets himself, as he was then conducting the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society, given at Exeter Hall. At all events, Wagner writes on June 25, 1855, the date of the last concert conducted by him:—

My dear Mr. Anderson,

Mr. Berlioz begs for two tickets for the Concert this evening. If you will have the goodness to give them to him, you can send them to me with my tickets, as I shall be seeing Mr. Berlioz again. Failing that, his address is 13, Margaret Street.

Au revoir for the last time this evening,

Yours sincerely,

RICHARD WAGNER.

It is not difficult to read between the lines of the last sentence of this letter.

The following is an interesting extract from a letter written in October, 1884, by Dvorák to Mr. Alfred Littleton, wherein the Bohemian master says (in his own English):—

That you were at Paris you have written me, but that you have bought the new oratorio 'Life and Death' by Gounod for the nice sum of 100,000 francs, I got informed from the Wiena and Prague papers only yesterday. Pray do not pay Mr. Gounod, who truly does not need it, so immense sums, for what could be left for me?

In future I would ask you to write me only English letters.

As far as I have gone through the new oratorio of Mackenzie's, I can tell you that I enjoyed it very much, and do not think to err that it is his best work. Receive my best thanks for it.

Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' was composed for and produced at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1885, and as Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' was also written for that occasion, the reference to 'what could be left for me?' is pretty obvious. The Mackenzie oratorio which Dvorák did 'not think to err that it is his best work,' was 'The Rose of Sharon,' produced at the Norwich Musical Festival of 1884.

No biographer of Handel has recorded that the great master ever drew up an organ specification, but we are enabled to give an instance of his handiwork in that capacity. The Earl Howe exhibited nine letters written by Handel to his Lordship's ancestor, Charles Jennens, of Gopsall, who compiled the word-book of the 'Messiah.' Eight of these communications have been printed, but not the ninth, which is the last in order of date. By the kind permission of Lord Howe we are enabled to print this interesting letter for the first time, and in doing so to make known how practical Handel was in the matter of designing an organ for his friend and patron Charles Jennens, Esquire, of Gopsall Hall, Leicestershire. Here is the letter:—

Sir,

Yesterday I received your Letter in answer to which I hereunder specify my opinion of an organ which I think will answer the ends you propose, being everything that is necessary for a good and grand organ, without reed stops, which I have omitted, because they are continually wanting to be tuned, which in the country is very inconvenient, and should it remain useless on that account, it would still be very expensive, altho' that may not be your consideration.

I very well approve of Mr. Bridge who without any objection is a very good organ builder, and I shall willingly (when he has finished it) give you my opinion of it. I have referr'd you to the Flute stop in Mr. Freeman's organ, being excellent in its kind, but as I do not refer you in that organ, the system of the organ I advise is (viz.)

The compass to be up to D and down to Gamut.

Sir,

Your most obedient and most humble servant,

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL.

Handel's reference to 'Church work' in his specification seems to imply that the organ was intended for the private chapel at Gopsall, but nothing is known on this point.

From the fine collection of portraits we select for illustration (p. 508) an oil-painting of Henry Lawes (1595-1662), lent by the Music School Collection, Oxford. It is the fashion in some quarters to decry 'those old Johnnies,' thus showing a shallowness of mind that no impressionist criticism can atone for. We owe not a little to those who have played so important a part in the evolution of the art, and who deserve to be honoured, though they did not write philosophic music that jars upon the ear and requires no end of explanation. In the case of Henry Lawes, he was 'the first Englishman who studied and practised with success the proper accentuation of words, and who made the sense of the poem of paramount importance.' (Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.') Moreover, as Lawes's settings of Psalms published in 1637 and 1648 are without bars, and his Ayres of 1652 and 1653 are furnished with these necessary interpretative adjuncts, it is probable that Henry Lawes was the first to adopt the invention. We often hear of the laws of harmony: would that we had more of the Lawes of melody—a number of Harrys, with their ‘tuneful and well-measured song.’

A companion portrait—also from the Music School Collection—is that of William Lawes, elder brother of Henry. One of the musicians in ordinary to Charles I., William Lawes was also a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, an office he held from 1603 to 1611, when he resigned, but in the latter year he was again re-admitted ‘without paie.’ He was a prolific composer: an anthem by him is in Boyce’s Cathedral Music, and some of his

No more complete collection of English Madrigals has hitherto been brought together than that contained within the walls of Fishmongers’ Hall last month. The Exhibition Catalogue showed very few blanks compared with the long list given by Rimbault in his ‘Bibliotheca Madrigaliana.’* We give the title of one of the earliest of these old part-books, for it must be remembered that in those days vocal part-music was not printed in score:—

The first sett of Italian Madrigalls Englished, not to the sense of the originall dittie, but after the affection of the Noate. By Thomas Watson, Gentleman. There instrumental music is in ‘Courtly Masquing Ayres’ (1662). William Lawes joined the Royalist army on the breaking out of the Civil War, and, although he was made a commissary by Lord Gerrard, in order to exempt him from danger, his active spirit disdained that security, and he was killed by a stray shot at the siege of Chester in the year 1645. The place of his burial is unknown, but the following punning epitaph upon him has been preserved:—

Concord is conquered—in the Urn there lyes
The master of great Music’s mysteries:

two settings of the same words, 'This sweet and merry month of May,' one of them in four parts, the other in six. Converso's 'When all alone my bonny (pretty) love' finds a place in this collection, published more than three hundred years ago.

A folio volume of MS. music from the library of Christ Church, Oxford, contains the following interesting inscription:—

BEN: ROGERS his Booke Aug. 18, 1673, and presented me by Mr. John Playford, stationer in the Temple, London.

This score booke was done formerly by that rare musician, Mr. Orlando Gibbons, and this book is of great value to the composer.

The riches of Mr. James E. Matthew's library were worthily represented at the Exhibition by some valuable books. Of these we mention five. The first is the 'Ballet Comique de la Royne' (Paris, 1582) of Balthasar Beaujoyeulx, the adopted name of one Baltazarini, a sixteenth-century Italian musician. As he appears to have been the first to introduce the Italian dances into Paris, he can claim to have been the founder of the ballet, and through the ballet, of the opera. The work above mentioned (from which several extracts are given by Burney in Vol. III. of his 'History') formed part of the entertainment in 'Circe' written for the marriage of the Duc de Joyeuse with Marguerite de Vaudemont de Lorraine, sister of the Queen of Henri III. of France. In the preface Beaujoyeulx states that the music was by Beaulieu and Maistre Salmon. The familiar air known as 'Gavotte de Louis XIII.' is taken from this Ballet. About the end of the sixteenth century there lived at Langres, in France, a priest of the name of Thoinot Arbeau, an anagrammatic form of his actual patronymic Tabourot. He was the author of an extremely rare book, of which Mr. Matthew possesses a fine copy, entitled: 'Orchésographie et Traicté en forme de dialogue par lequel toutes personnes peuvent facilement apprendre et pratiquer l'honnête exercice des danses' (1588). The volume, which contains a large number of French dance-tunes with words fitted to the melody, is one of great interest and value in the history of dance music. No less valuable are Mr. Matthew's scarce copies of the word-books of the operas 'L'Euridice' (1600) and 'La Dafne' (1602), the librettos by Ottavio Rinuccini, music by Jacopo Peri, Father of the opera.

The rarest book in Mr. Matthew's library is a magnificent copy of the 'El Melopeo' of Pedro Cerone, which, although written in Spanish, was the work of an Italian and published at Naples in 1613, in a folio volume of about twelve hundred pages. The author, born at Bergamo, became a priest, and, visiting Spain, joined the Chapel Royal of Philip II. and his successor Philip III. The kingdom of Naples and that of Spain were then under the same ruler, and thus the services of Cerone were transferred to Naples, and there his book was published. It is supposed that the king must have borne the whole or a part of the expense of printing it, and that he made the use of the Spanish language a condition of his assistance. The tradition is that the entire edition was shipped to Spain, that the ship was wrecked, and the whole of the copies lost with the exception of thirteen which had been retained in Naples. We are ignorant of the authority for this story, but the work is undoubtedly among the scarcest in musical literature. Fétis speaks of the difficulties which both he and Padre Martini met with in obtaining copies, and of the want of success which attended Dr. Burney in the search.

WILLIAM LAWES.

Bright and gay, owing to some highly-coloured frontispieces, was the case containing certain Song Books from the splendid collection made by the titles, selected from the books exhibited, will speak for themselves :—

THE MUSES BANQUET ; or, a Present from Parnassus. Being a Collection of such English and Scots Songs as are well worth preserving ; songs that are perfectly decent, that have some scope and design, and that tend either to improve the Mind, mend the Manners, or make the Heart merry. Reading, Printed by C. Micklewright, for T. Carnan, at the Bible and Sun, in St. Paul's Churchyard, London. 1752.

MONSTROUS GOOD SONGS, Sentiments and Toasts, humorous Medlies, Cantatas, Catches and Gleees, for the year 1794, as sung at all Public places of amusement. Dedicated to the Sons of Mirth and Jollity.

TEGG'S COMIC SONG BOOK. Being an excellent Collection of Comic, Laughable, Queer, Rum, Facetious, and Whimsical Songs, with many Originals. The whole calculated to curl up the corners of the mouth, and cheer up the cockles of the heart in these hard Times. 1819.

FAIRBURN'S EVERLASTING SONGSTER. Being an extensive collection of One Thousand Naval, Love, Comic, Hunting, Bacchanalian, Sentimental, Scotch, and Irish Songs. With Toasts and Sentiments. circa 1825. (Coloured vignette and front : 'The Vicar and Moses.'

We may now make mention of some of the instruments, beautiful in appearance even in their old age. The King lent an Italian viola made by Aptonium and Hieronymus Amati of Cremona, date about 1630, and reduced from a viol. This, the King's viola,—which, by gracious permission of His Majesty, we have been allowed to photograph—is ornamented with three paintings on the back: to the left is a figure of St. John the Baptist with the Lamb ; in the centre a coat of arms ; to the right another figure nearly obliterated by use. It has also two inscriptions round the sides: 'Ecce Agnus Dei' and 'Guila Maria Bernardi.' An elaborately carved violin (see illustration on page 512) was lent by the Earl and Countess of Warwick. This exquisite instrument, of English manufacture and made of boxwood, is carved with woodland scenes. Its date is 1578 ; but it is quite possible that the wood-carving is some centuries older than the upper portion of the instrument and that it really dates from about 1330. This violin may therefore be a reconstruction of an older instrument of the violin species. It is not without historic interest in that it is said to have been given by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Leicester: the arms of both these exalted personages are engraved in silver on the finger-board. A fine specimen of the Lute genus is the twelve-stringed instrument of Italian make from the collection of Mr. T. W. Taphouse. The delicately designed rose is of ivory with a jewel in its centre. (See the illustration on page 502.) When we know what extraordinary transformations were made by Orpheus when he played the lute, it seems provoking that we have no definite knowledge of how that gentleman tuned his instrument. The tuning difficulty connected with the lute is no mere modern obstacle to performance thereupon. For example, nearly two hundred years ago Mattheson wrote: 'If a lute-player have lived eighty years he has probably spent about sixty late Sir John Stainer, now the property of his son, Mr. J. F. R. Stainer, one of the honorary secretaries of this Exhibition. The following four years tuning his instrument.' The lute comes next to the viol in the number of times it is mentioned by Shakespeare. Let us turn to 'The Taming of the Shrew' and see what the immortal bard has to say concerning the tuning of the intractable instrument:—

Bianca (to Hortensio).

Take you your instrument, play you the whiles;

His lecture will be done, ere you have tun'd.

Hor. You'll leave his lecture, when I am in tune?

Lucentio. That will be never: tune your instrument.

Hor. Madam, my instrument's in tune.

Bian. Let's hear; [Hortensio plays.] O fie! the treble jars.

Luc. Spit in the hole, man, and tune again.

Hor. Madam, 'tis now in tune.

Luc. All but the base.

Hor. The base is right; 'tis the base knave that jars.

The guitar is a modern representative of the numerous family which includes the lute. Sir George Donaldson—an enthusiast in his devotion to all old instruments—lends a magnificent guitar, of which an illustration will be found on page 506. This richly inlaid instrument, said to have belonged to the ill-fated King Henry IV. of France, was made by Joachim Tielke, of Hamburg, a famous sixteenth-century artist in the manufacture of stringed instruments of the guitar and viol da gamba type.* From Tielke's workshop also came (in 1539) the Quinterna (or Chiterna) belonging to the Victoria and Albert Museum (South Kensington), a photograph of which is given in the opposite column. This exquisite instrument is of tortoise-shell, incrustated with mythological subjects in ivory, and set with precious stones. The Quinterna (or Chiterna) is thus described in Stainer and Barrett's 'Dictionary of Musical Terms':—

A species of guitar not unlike a violin in shape, having three, or four, or five pairs of catgut strings, and sometimes two single strings covered with wire in addition, played with the fingers, not with a plectrum.

The dulcimer is the prototype of the pianoforte, although the strings are set in vibration by small hammers held in the hands: the substitution of keys to do the work of the hand-held hammers makes a long step in the evolution of the keyboard instrument of to-day. A trapeze-shaped little instrument, not more than three feet in its greatest width, the dulcimer is laid upon a table or frame as shown in the photograph (on page 507) of Mr. Arthur F. Hill's prettily decorated specimen.

The etymology of the term Virginal is thus given by Blount in his Glossographia (1656): 'Virginal (virginalis), maidenly, virginlike; hence the name of that musical instrument called Virginals, because maids and virgins do most commonly play on them.' A 'proverb' said to have been formerly inscribed on a wall of the Manor House of Leckington, Yorkshire, temp. Henry VIII. (1485-1509), reads thus:—

A slac stryng in a Virginnall soundithe not aright,
It doth abide no wrestinge it is so loose and light;
The sound-borde crasade, forsith the instrumente, Throw misgovernance, to make notes which was Not his intente.

* For further information concerning the Tielke family and the instruments made by them, see Miss Stainer's excellent Primer 'A Dictionary of Violin Makers.'

A typical and valuable specimen of this old-world keyboard instrument is that belonging to Mr. C. Van Raalte. Of Italian manufacture, it dates from the seventeenth century, the interior of the cover being painted with amorini dancing, as shown in the photograph on page 501.

A very charming chamber-organ, of which we give a photograph on page 505, was lent by Mr. W. Howard Head. It bears the date 1602, and a quotation from the 150th Psalm, of which the English translation is:—

Praise the Lord with stringed instruments and organs.

This instrument is probably of Flemish origin, and appears to have been made for the then Earl of Montrose, whose armorial bearings form a prominent feature, and whose initial 'J' (for John Graham) is so treated in the ornamentation of the case that the monogram forms also an 'M' (for Montrose) under a coronet. Moreover, the plugs of the elaborately carved wooden pipes are made to resemble, as far as possible, the Scotch thistle, a pretty and prickly compliment to its first owner. The organ, in spite of its three centuries of age, is in a perfect playing condition, while the tone is of that softened sweetness characteristic of most old-world instruments. Its compass is from E to C, forty-five notes; the stops, three in number, are stopped diapason, flute, and regal, the last-named being only twenty-six notes in compass—B to C. There is also a tremolo which, used in conjunction with the regal stop, produces very much the effect of a vox humana. There is no draw-stop action of the usual kind, but the slides are worked direct, a carved knob being affixed at the end of each slide. As there are no pedals, the performer is also able to discharge the duties of organ-blower. This handsome organ has always been known as 'Queen Elizabeth's,' or 'Princess Elizabeth's'; but there is every reason to think that the latter is the correct version in regard to a former ownership, as the daughter of Charles I. died at Carisbrooke Castle, and the instrument was for very many years domiciled in, and associated with, the Isle of Wight.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

As the last payment to Burney as organist of St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn, was made at Michaelmas, 1759, it may be assumed that he left the Norfolk town at that time or soon afterwards. It should be observed that Burney's organistship at King's Lynn coincided with the last seven years of Handel's life. Had the historian of music lived in London instead of in the country at that time, it is more than probable that we should be in possession of much information concerning the eventide of the great composer's career.

Upon his return to London Burney resided in Poland Street, leading off Oxford Street, then called Oxford Road. At that time Poland Street, now a dingy thoroughfare, could boast of aristocratic inhabitants—to wit, the Duke of Chandos, Sir Willoughby Aston, Lady Augusta Bridges, while the Cherokee King took lodgings almost immediately opposite the Burney habitation, to the great delight of the children. Papa Burney, then aged thirty-four, became a fashionable and busy teacher of music. His industry was no less remarkable than his powers of endurance, for he gave lessons from 8 a.m. till 11 p.m., wrote until 4 a.m., rose three hours later, and yet he lived to the age of eighty-eight! When Lady Tankerville wished to resume her lessons in her old age, the many-pupilled teacher said that his day, from eight in the morning, was completely filled up. 'Come to me, then, at seven!' replied the vivacious old dame, with the result that, twice a week, Burney must have arrived at her ladyship's residence with the morning's milk. Hetty, or Esther, Burney's eldest daughter, used to astonish her father's guests by her skilful harpsichord playing. She made a prodigy appearance in public on April 23, 1760, at the 'little Theatre in the Haymarket.*

And here we may refer to the other members of this exceedingly clever family—of whom no fewer than five have found places in 'The Dictionary of National Biography.' Of the sons, James entered the Royal Navy. He achieved fame in his profession and sailed twice round the world with Captain Cook. Beloved by Charles Lamb, he is depicted by Southey as 'smoking after supper, and letting out puffs at one corner of his mouth and puns at the other.' Humour, by-the-way, was—and is—a marked characteristic of the Burney family. Perchance this merry-heartedness may have conduced to their longevity. Charles, the second son, became eminent as a classical scholar, Greek being his special subject. The fame of Fanny, afterwards Madame D'Arblay, is too well known to be enlarged upon; while Susannah and Sarah (a daughter by a second marriage) were endowed with considerable literary gifts. 'All, all very clever girls. Sense and witta inhabit here,' remarked Pacchieroti, in his broken English. 'All I meet with at Burney's house are superior to other people. I am myself the only Bestia that enters the house. I am, indeed, a truly Beast,' by which the great singer probably meant nothing more than is conveyed by the French word bête.

A shadow came across the happy home-life of the Burneys by the death, in 1761, of the mother of the family. Not much is known of Burney's career immediately after his great loss, except that he sought to mitigate his grief by attempting a prose translation of Dante's 'Inferno.' On June 10, 1763, there was performed at Ranelagh Gardens 'An Ode on Saint Cecilia's Day, adapted to the Ancient British Musick'—the salt-box, Jew's harp, hurdy-gurdy, marrow-bones and cleavers, &c. For this burlesque production, written by Bonnell Thornton, Burney had previously composed the music. 'It was performed,' he says, 'at Ranelagh in masks to a very crowded audience. Beard sang the salt-box song, which was admirably accompanied on that instrument by Brent, the celebrated singer; Skeggs on the broomstick as bassoon, and a remarkable performer on the Jew's harp—"Buzzing twangs the iron lyre." Cleavers were cast in bell metal for this entertainment. All the performers of the Old Woman's Oratory, employed by Foote, were, I believe, employed at Ranelagh on that occasion.' A visit to Paris in 1764, in order to place his daughters at school there, not only helped to revive Burney's spirits at the loss of his wife, but enabled him to become acquainted with Rousseau's 'Le Devin du Village.' At the suggestion of Garrick, Burney, on his return to London, translated and adapted the work to the English stage. Under the title of 'The Cunning Man' it was performed at Drury Lane Theatre, November 21, 1766, during Rousseau's visit to England, but without success. Jullien concocted one of his earliest quadrilles on tunes from 'Le Devin,' and the hymn-tune known as 'Rousseau's Dream' is derived from an instrumental movement headed 'Pantomime'!

Burney married a second time on October 2, 1767, his bride being the wealthy widow of a Lynn wine-merchant. For a time the marriage was kept secret; but Mrs. Burney No. 2—'something of a blue-stocking to boot,' as the sole biographer of Madame D'Arblay observes—soon took her place as the mistress of the Poland Street home. Two years later—on June 23, 1769—Burney took the degree of Doctor in Music at the University of Cambridge. His 'exercise,' an anthem, was performed in the Music School, and 'received with universal applause,' while Dr. Hayes lent his robes 'with very good grace.' The principal vocalist on that occasion was Miss Jenny Barsanti, a pupil of the newly-fledged doctor. Burney's exercise had the distinction of being performed at three subsequent Musical Festivals held at Oxford, and also in the Katharinenkirche, Hamburg, under the direction of C. P. E. Bach, son of the immortal John Sebastian of that illustrious ilk. 'An Essay towards a history of comets' belongs to this year, but an attack of rheumatic fever caused Dr. Burney to forsake his studies in astronomy.

About this time he began seriously to attack the subject of his 'History of Music' by systematically classifying the material he had accumulated at Lynn and subsequently in London. Fanny became amanuensis and keeper of the records. In order, however, to adequately carry out his intentions in regard to the 'History,' Burney felt that a visit to the Continent was necessary. Well provided with letters of introduction, he left England in June, 1770, for a six months' tour in Italy, France, and Switzerland, the object of his journey being to gather information concerning ancient music and to study the actual condition of the art by personal observation. Rousseau and Diderot at Paris became interested in the project and rendered valuable aid. At Ferney he had a chance interview with Voltaire who, although seventy-eight and wasted to a skeleton, was working ten hours a day and writing without spectacles! On his return to England Burney sought the quietude of Chessington Hall, Ewell, the residence of his friend, Samuel Crisp, where he prepared for publication the diary of his tour—a volume which appeared with the following title:—

The Present State of Music in France and Italy: or
The Journal of a Tour through those Countries, undertaken to collect Materials for a General History of Music.
By CHARLES BURNEY, Mus.D.

Ei cantarono allor fi dolcemente,
Che la dolcezza ancor dentro mi suona.

One of the readers of this successful book was Dr. Johnson, who, in writing his own 'Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland,' said that he had in his eye 'that clever dog, Burney.'

During the absence in 'furrin parts' of her lord and master, Mrs. Burney removed from Poland Street to a more commodious residence in Queen Square, Bloomsbury, then situated almost in the country. The new house afforded a delightful prospect of Highgate and Hampstead, two northern heights which Miss Fanny Burney spelled 'Hygate and Hamstead'! Encouraged by the success of his first Continental journey, Burney began to learn German in order to equip himself for another tour—this time in Germany and the Netherlands, whither he started in July, 1772. His peregrinations extended as far as Vienna, and included Dresden and Berlin. A curious incident occurred during his return to England on a stormy day in December, 1773. On the way from Calais to Dover he became so exhausted with sea-sickness that he fell asleep in his berth, and was taken back again to the French port from whence he had come!

A severe illness followed upon this dual experience of mal de mer; but with his unfailing energy he dictated to his daughters, from his bed, an account of the Continental experiences so far as his prostrate condition permitted. This, the second book of travels, appeared in May, 1773, entitled 'The present state of Music in Germany, the Netherlands, and United Provinces,' &c. (two vols.). The publication contained 'Proposals for printing, by subscription, a General History of Music, from the earliest ages to the present period. By Charles Burney, Mus.D., F.R.S.' The original idea was to issue the work in two volumes at the price to subscribers of two guineas—'one guinea to be paid at the time of subscribing, and the other on delivery of the second volume, in sheets.' When the German Tour was published (in May, 1773), Burney said that unless he should have 500 subscribers by the following Christmas, he would entirely withhold the issue of the 'History.' In the same year (1773) he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in the following year he projected the establishment of a Public Music School, to be located at the Foundling Hospital and for the training of the musically-gifted children in that charitable Institution. Strong opposition to the proposal necessitated its abandonment, though Burney deserves credit for his zeal in the cause of musical education. In this respect, at least, he was much in advance of his time.

An interesting event in the family life of the Burneys was their removal from Queen Square, Bloomsbury, to the habitation formerly occupied by Sir Isaac Newton, No. 35 (then No. 1) St. Martin's Street, Leicester Square. The house, which still stands, had (and has) on its left-hand side the chapel in Orange Street, where the Rev. Augustus Montague Toplady then preached. Moreover, his world-famed sacred lyric, 'Rock of Ages, cleft for me,' made its first appearance in the Gospel Magazine, March, 1776, of which Toplady was editor, at the time that the Burneys were, so to speak, his next-door neighbours. Much good music and abundance of brilliant conversation were made within the walls of the St. Martin's Street house. Under that hospitable roof not a few of the shining lights of literature and art gathered together in genial and intellectual intercourse. Among those who often 'dropped in' were Garrick and Dr. Johnson. The great lexicographer—with whom at King's Lynn Burney had become acquainted through correspondence—was a frequent and welcome visitor. Music had no delights for Dr. Johnson, who used to speak slightly of the art until he knew Burney. One day, however, Mrs. Thrale read aloud to him the following extract from the preface to Burney's 'History of Music,' then in manuscript:—

The love of lengthened tones and modulated sounds, seems a passion implanted in human nature throughout the globe; as we hear of no people, however wild and savage in other particulars, who have not music of some kind or other, with which they seem greatly delighted.

'Madam,' said Dr. Johnson, after a little pause, 'this assertion I believe may be right,' and then, after see-sawing a moment or two in his chair, he forcibly added, 'All animated nature loves music—except myself'! On another occasion Mrs. Thrale said: 'Pray, Dr. Burney, will you be so good as to tell me what that song was which Savoi sang at Bach's concert, and which you did not hear?' Burney genially replied that, though he lived in the house once occupied by Sir Isaac Newton, he was no diviner of such things, and he had not had time to consult the stars; but being anxious to draw Dr. Johnson—then deeply absorbed in an encyclopædia—into conversation, Burney ventured to interrupt him with Mrs. Thrale's 'conjuring request' relating to Bach's concert. Johnson, entering into the humour of the situation, good-naturedly put away his book, and, rocking his chair as usual, drolly said: 'Bach, Sir? Bach's concert?—and pray, Sir, who is Bach? Is he a piper?' In this Johnsonian connection with the subject of our biographical sketch, we may quote the following extract from Madame D'Arblay's 'Memoirs of Dr. Burney.' She is describing a social gathering at Mrs. Thrale's, at Streatham, from which her father had to leave hurriedly:—

"Dr. Burney," said Mr. Murphy [one of the guests], "is indeed a most extraordinary man. I think I do not know such another. He is at home upon all subjects, and upon all is so highly agreeable. I look upon him as a wonderful man."

"I love Burney!" cried Dr. Johnson, emphatically: "my heart, as I told him—goes out to meet Burney!"

"He is not ungrateful, Sir," cried the Doctor's bairne, "for heartily does he love you!"

"Does he, Madam?" said the Doctor, looking at her earnestly: "I am surprised at that!"

"And why, Sir?—why should you have doubted it?"

"Because, Madam," answered he gravely, "Dr. Burney is a man for everybody to love. It is but natural to love him! . . . I question if there be in the world such another man, altogether, for mind, intelligence, and manners, as Dr. Burney."

That Burney had the same feelings towards Dr. Johnson is shown in some lines he wrote in the year 1776. Here they are:—

This year I acquaintance began with the Thrales,
Where I met with great talents 'mongst females and males:
But the best thing that happen'd from that time to this,
Was the freedom it gave me to sound the abyss,
At my ease and my leisure, of Johnson's great mind,
Where new treasures unnumber'd I constantly find.

Huge Briareus's hands, if old bards have not blunder'd, Amounted in all to the sum of one hundred;
And Johnson,—so wide his intelligence spreads,
Has the brains of—at least—the same number of heads.

We may now pass on to the great event of Dr. Burney's life—the publication of the 'History of Music' which has immortalised his name. In the preparation of his magnum opus Burney had unusual opportunities, not only of Continental travel, but of easy access to books—for instance, he was allowed to consult and transcribe at his own house one, at least, of the precious tomes in the Royal Music Library at Buckingham Palace, a privilege for which a present-day historian might justly envy him. The first volume of the work appeared in 1776 with the following title:—

A | GENERAL HISTORY | OF | MUSIC, | from the | earliest ages to the present period. | To which is prefixed, | a Dissertation | on the | music of the Ancients. | By | CHARLES BURNEY, Mus.D., F.R.S. | volume the first. | London, | Printed for the Author: | and sold by T. Becket, Strand; J. Robson, | New Bond Street; and G. Robinson, Paternoster Row. | MDCCCLXXVI.

The work was dedicated to Queen Charlotte, the Consort of George the Third. It is interesting to look down the long list of subscribers, headed by the Prince of Wales. The names include the following famous men:—

M. Carl. Phil. Emanuel Bach, Hamburg.

Dr. William Boyce.

David Garrick, Esq.

Hon. Warren Hastings, Governor-General of Bengal,
3 copies.

Sir John Hawkins, Knight.

Dr. Samuel Johnson.

Abate Metastasio.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, Knt.

M. Jean Jacques Rousseau.

Rev. Mr. Westley.

In this goodly company of subscribers the 'Rev. Mr. Westley' is doubtless Charles Wesley, the hymn-writer, while it is pleasant to find the name of Sir John Hawkins, the rival historian of music, whose work, by-the-way, appeared (complete) in the same year as Burney's Volume I. Six years elapsed before Burney's second volume appeared (in 1782), while Volumes III. and IV., completing the work, were issued in 1789. It is not necessary to draw a comparison between the merits of the two Histories. Each occupies its own particular niche as a book of reference, and bears testimony to the industry of its author. The Hawkins volumes have been reprinted, while those of Burney have not. For the sake of completeness we may re-quote from the biographical sketch of Sir John Hawkins (THE MUSICAL TIMES, February, 1904) the words of the Catch (set to music by Dr. Callcott) which read thus—

Have you Sir John Hawkins' History?

Some folks think it quite a mystery.

Musick filled his wondrous brain.

How d'ye like him? is it plain?

Both I've read and must agree

That Burney's History pleases me.

This Catch in performance punningly sounds thus:—

Sir John Hawkins!

Burn his history!

How d'ye like him?

Burn his history!

Burney's History pleases me.

In the next and concluding instalment of this biographical chit-chat we hope to refer to Burney's attitude towards Bach, and his conversion to 'Bachism' through the influence of Samuel Wesley. In the meantime our readers will doubtless be glad to have the fine portrait of Fanny Burney (Madame D'Arblay) painted by the cousin, Edward Burney, which, through the kindness of the Ven. Archdeacon Burney, forms one of our Special Supplements.

The following replies—the genuineness of which we can fully authenticate—were in answer to questions in an examination paper set by an examiner of repute:—

Marenzio was a German lady who introduced notes into music. She lived in the 13th century A.D. and was burnt as a martyr at Rouen.

Palestrina was the son of a stock-broker and brother of Beethoven.

What Marxsen did for young Brahms is a matter of history, and need not be re-told here. The pupil publicly acknowledged his debt many years afterwards when he dedicated his great Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (No. 2) 'to his dear friend and teacher.'

Of Brahms's earliest attempts at composition ; of the hackwork he did to the order of sundry Hamburg this handsome, thoughtful, uncorrupted young genius in some haunt of vice playing mechanically to noisy crowds of drunken sailors and their 'friends,' the while on the pianoforte instead of the music which he knows by heart there lies a volume of Heine's or Eichendorff's poems which completely enchains his thoughts and transports them to the fair and entrancing realm of Romance, to fields and forests, castles and fastnesses. Few composers of genius have been so persistently charged with writing 'study' music that 'smells of the lamp,' and yet no man that ever lived by the products of his brain could have been more passionately fond than he was of the open air and God's glorious sunshine, of the green grass and blue sky, the dark forest and bright glade, the rivers and the everlasting hills. He always composed in the open air, 'took his thoughts for a walk' as he expressed himself, and only wrote down in his study what he had conceived on his long tramps, or in his reveries as he lay under some leafy tree. Occasionally he even went so far as to prefer the forest to his bed, and it was this habit of sleeping in the open air which cost him his voice. He caught a cold which developed into a severe laryngeal catarrh ; as a result his voice was retarded in its development, and though he took heroic measures—rivalling the lingual gymnastics of Demosthenes—to 'fix' his vocal organ, he only succeeded in producing a rasping bass which, during moments of excitement, plainly showed that it was only a 'screwed down' high tenor.

Young Brahms, though a dreamer when spell-bound by his muse, evinced a healthy interest in his fellow-creatures. He frequented the wharves and docks whence emigrants sailed to far-away countries, and where sailors of many nationalities congregated. He enjoyed all the fun of the fairs in Hamburg and surrounding villages, and the fearful and wonderful raree-shows they offered. On one such occasion he had his bumps told by a phrenologist, who exclaimed : 'Yours is a strange head ; there is something extraordinary about it. You may become a great reformer!' The learned disciple of Gall must have mistaken Brahms's bumps for Wagner's. So much for phrenology ! One of the boy's favourite amusements was to take a stroll into the suburbs with a friend, ring the bells at likely-looking houses, and inquire whether Herr Georg Friedrich Händel, or some other long-deceased celebrity, lived there, and to simulate the greatest astonishment and disappointment when, after repeated pressing inquiries, the mischievous youth was answered by the bewildered tenant that he was publishers and issued under assumed names ; of his duties in connection with his father's small band ; of his boyish pranks and aspirations, we have full and highly-interesting information. Herr Kalbeck waxes quite pathetic as he conjures up before our eyes the picture—worthy of being perpetuated on canvas!—of quite sure no such person lived there! Needless to say he came very near receiving a sound thrashing when fooling people who saw through his little game.

Of his meeting with the Hungarian violinist Eduard Reményi we have full and amusing details. Nothing could better characterize that strange but clever charlatan—who, by-the-way, was a German-Hungarian Jew, Hoffmann by name—than the story how he used to play the last bar of the theme of the slow movement of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata thus, 'in the Hungarian style':—

The famous incident by which Joachim was said to have first been drawn towards the young composer whose closest, life-long friend and brave, unflinching champion he was destined to become, has been corrected by Herr Kalbeck in some important particulars. It was the Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2) of which Brahms transposed the pianoforte part half-a-tone higher, and from memory! to please Reményi, and not the Kreutzer Sonata, as even Mr. Hadow in his beautiful monograph ('Studies in Modern Music,' Second Series) states. This happened, or is supposed to have happened,—for even our painstaking author is unable, only fifty years after the event, to verify this detail—at Celle, in Hanover, not at Göttingen; nor was Joachim present. The great violinist first met Johannes in Hanover, when that ideal friendship commenced which was to be so rich in results for art, as it was fraught with happiness for the two friends. The life in the 'Altenburg,' Liszt's, or rather the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein's house in Weimar, is described at considerable length, and in order to contrast his hero's unsophisticated nature and simple mode of existence with the Piano King's exotic life as 'managed' for him by his 'bon ange adorable,' the aforesaid Russian princess, Herr Kalbeck allows his prejudice to bias him to an amusing extent. There can be no doubt however that young Brahms displayed remarkable strength of character when he decided to escape from the magic charm of Liszt's wonderful personality—a charm to which he at first succumbed as readily and as completely as the rest of mankind. When he found it impossible to join in the chorus of adulation which the visitors to the Altenburg chanted daily and hourly to the greater glory of Liszt the composer, he fled. All through life he was, however, an enthusiastic admirer of Liszt the pianist. Thus he remarked on one occasion to Klaus Groth, the Low German poet: 'We too can play the piano (he named himself and several other pianists of mark), but we each have only a few fingers of his two hands.' And again: 'Who has not heard Liszt simply cannot speak on piano playing; he comes first, and then for a long while comes nobody. There is about his playing something unique, incomparable, and inimitable.'

Herr Kalbeck throws doubt on Mr. Mason's story of Brahms falling asleep while Liszt was playing his own B minor Pianoforte Sonata to a circle of admirers, and as Mason himself confesses that he has the tale from Reményi, there is ample reason for taking it cum grano salis.

When we reach the chapter on Brahms's Düsseldorf experiences, our author's enthusiasm breaks forth with refreshing exuberance. How Johannes met Schumann and his wife, their astonishment at his playing and his compositions, the intimate friendship which soon sprang up between them, the happy life which the twenty-year-old genius led in the charming art-centre in the homes of musicians and painters, how Schumann's famous article 'Neue Bahnen,' which heralded the advent of the new 'strong fighter,' burst like a bombshell in the camps of 'new German' and conservative musicians alike; of all this and much more of surpassing interest, he who runs may read in these fascinating pages. Herr Kalbeck wields a ready and brightly polished pen. He writes a clear, nervous, and convincing German in which sentences of a measurable length do fortunately preponderate. His book is of course primarily intended for out-and-out Brahms admirers. To them not even the smallest detail bearing upon the life and work, the friends and foes of their hero, fails to prove interesting. And when it happens that the reader is familiar with some of the places in which Brahms spent his youth, and can bring his memory to locate the very streets and parks and restaurants which the master frequented; when, moreover, the compositions which are so enthusiastically described are to him familiar as household words, then Herr Kalbeck may be sure of that reader's abounding gratitude for having supplied him with a tome after his own heart.

One of the most engrossing subjects dealt with is that of the lost compositions. We read of early Trios, Quartets and Violin Sonatas, of songs and choral works (e.g., a Mass in canon throughout for five-part female chorus), which were destroyed by the young master after Schumann's panegyric had appeared in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. That article, written and signed by Germany's foremost composer and critic, was enough either to make its protagonist a conceited coxcomb, or paralyse his imagination. It did neither. Brahms remained the most modest of young men, and on the other hand the praise and prophecy of the revered Düsseldorf master only spurred him on to attain greater perfection in the art of which he was indeed destined to become a great and shining ornament. But the inconceivably severe self-criticism which he exercised, and the terrible execution which he did amongst his manuscripts, cause us almost to regret that Schumann ever put pen to paper to proclaim the 'new musical Messiah.' When we realize that such fine works as the Pianoforte Sonatas, the B major Trio, the Scherzo in E flat minor, and the First Book of songs (including the superb 'O versenk,' were amongst the few things that were spared in the auto-da-fé, we wish we could see some of the missing links in the golden chain of juvenilia. We especially regret the loss of the songs.

Herr Kalbeck quotes Brahms's remark when asked whether he had retained any of his early works: 'Heaven forbid!' quoth the master, 'The stuff has all been burnt. The boxes with the manuscripts were for a long time in Hamburg. When I was there a few years ago I went into the loft. The whole room had been most beautifully papered with my music, even the ceiling. I had only to lie on my back to admire my Sonatas and Quartets. It looked very jolly. I tore it all down—better I did it than others!—and burnt the rest. Quite charming little songs (recht nette Liederchen) there were amongst it. The whole of Eichendorff and Heine I had set to music. Surely you will believe that I too composed 'Du bist wie eine Blume.'

The youthful portrait of Brahms—which by Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel's permission is reproduced from Herr Kalbeck's book—was drawn at Schumann's request by Laurens, a French painter, born at Montpellier, who had given Mendelssohn lessons in painting at Frankfurt. Laurens was a great lover of music, and had come to Düsseldorf to study under Schumann.

IN PRAISE OF THE PITCH-PIPE.

This Instrument some Teachers do refuse,
And laugh at Things, they know not how to use :
So self-conceited Fools deem all Things vain
That others do ; which they cannot attain.

Such Paper-Skulls, much better had been mute,
Unless they were more able to dispute,
And speak with Judgment :—But alas ! we find,
Those Tongues run most, whose Brains lie most behind.

From W. Tansur's 'A New Musical Grammar : or, the Harmonical Spectator,' 1746.

'Delightfully refreshing,' 'most charming,' are samples of the appreciative comments passed upon a very dainty performance (under Dr. Cowen) of Mendelssohn's Scherzo at the last Philharmonic concert on June 30. A few words concerning the history of this fairylike creation may therefore be acceptable at this out-door season of the year. The Scherzo, which originally formed (and still forms) one of the movements of the Octet for Strings (Op. 20), was composed by Mendelssohn when he was half-way through his seventeenth year—an extraordinary example of boyish genius in music. He confided to his sister Fanny that his motto for the Scherzo was the following stanza in the Intermezzo of 'Faust':—

Floating cloud and trailing mist
Bright'ning o'er us hover ;
Airs stir the brake, the rushes shake—
And all their pomp is over.

and, in the words of Sir George Grove, 'never was a motto more perfectly carried out in execution.'

Mendelssohn, aged twenty, paid his first visit to England in the year 1829, when he made his first appearance before an English audience at the Philharmonic concert of May 25, 1829. On that occasion he conducted his C minor Symphony (Op. 11). Now this work originally contained a Minuet and Trio as its third movement. In that form the Symphony had already been published at Berlin, and consequently there was no copyright in the music so far as England was concerned. But when Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co. proposed to issue a four-hand pianoforte arrangement of the work, Mendelssohn thereupon orchestrated the Scherzo of his Octet (above referred to)—which, though written in 1825, was still unprinted—and substituted this movement for the original Minuet and Trio of the Symphony. By this means a new right was established on the strength of these alterations. Thus a copyright question called into existence one of Mendelssohn's most delightful orchestral compositions. In an admirable analysis of the Symphony, the late Sir George Macfarren said :—

The rest of the work showed the author to be a capital musician : this movement [the Scherzo] showed him to be MENDELSSOHN. It is not a mere rescript of the Scherzo of the Octet, its plan being compressed in the second part, and some of its passages—one with a turn of demisemiquavers, particularly—being materially changed to suit the altered means. The instrumentation of the whole Symphony is admirable for clearness and richness, but that of this movement is a masterpiece, whose most beautiful effects are quite without precedent.

The following criticism, from the Athenæum, upon the Scherzo and its initial performance is interesting as showing that Mendelssohn reduced the number of players in the orchestra for the interpretation of his elf-like strains :—

. . . an unusually delicious, playful, and original scherzo in C [G] minor (apparently written expressly for the occasion) gave delight to every auditor, and was unanimously encored. It was performed by only a limited number of violins, tenors, and basses, but obligato for them, and all the wind instruments.—Athenæum, June 10, 1829.

The autograph of Mendelssohn's C minor Symphony—headed 'Symphony XIII.'—is in the possession of the Philharmonic Society, to whom Mendelssohn dedicated the work. The Scherzo—called, by-the-way, Intermezzo in the original programme and in the pianoforte-duet arrangement—was undoubtedly orchestrated by the composer during his first sojourn in London. The orchestral score of this Scherzo (Intermezzo) has never been printed, and it has always been played from manuscript parts ; but of course the movement appears in the pianoforte-duet arrangement, published by Messrs. Cramer in 1829 with the following title :—

GRAND SYMPHONY | performed | at the | Philharmonic concerts | composed & adapted | for two performers on the | Piano Forte | with accompaniments of | Violin & Violoncello (ad lib.) | and Dedicated to the | Philharmonic Society | by | FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLODY.

How pleased Mendelssohn was with the performance of his Symphony, and the welcome he received from music-lovers in England, is recorded in the following letter—written in French—which he sent to the Secretary of the Philharmonic Society : 'I deeply feel the honour of which the Philharmonic Society has deemed me worthy, in performing a symphony of my composition at the last concert, an honour which I can never forget. I know that my success, obtained through the brilliant execution of the orchestra, is due much less to my talent than to the indulgence shown to my youth ; but, encouraged by a reception so flattering, I shall labour to justify the hopes entertained of me, to which I undoubtedly owe the kind feeling shown to me.'

Claudio Merulo, or Claudio da Corregio, died at Parma, aged 71, on May 4, 1604, and to celebrate the tercentenary of that event his 'Mass à 8' was performed in the Steccata, or ducal chapel, under the direction of Amilcare Zanella. At the age of twenty-four Merulo was appointed second organist of St. Mark's, Venice, but after twenty-seven years' service he became organist to the Duke of Parma. A small organ, which he built with his own hands, was presented a few years after his death, by his nephew, to the 'Compagnia della morte.' That instrument—according to Fétis containing two flute stops of 8 and 4 feet, a fifteenth, and a flageolet, also a keyboard consisting of four octaves—has been preserved and is to be restored. Merulo only left Parma once to go to Rome to arrange about the publication of his 'Toccate d'Intavolatura d'Organo' (1597). This work is of great interest to all who care to trace the evolution of organ music ; it is probable however that in performance the composer added to the printed letter according to the inspiration of the moment. A fine copy of this early work engraved on copper plates was exhibited by Mr. Alfred Littleton, at the recent Loan Exhibition of the Musicians' Company.

Notes and Queries recently contained the following interesting communication, from Mr. Thomas Bayne, on the subject of Sir Walter Scott's music-master :—

Although it is on record that, at certain Galashiels festivities, Scott used to chant 'Tarry Woo' with captivating zest and appreciation, it is the case that he was anything but an accomplished musician. He is himself the authority on this point, for in the autobiographical fragment prefixed to Lockhart's 'Life' he says that he could never manage to sing, although when young and receptive he was given the opportunity for learning. 'My mother,' he says, 'was anxious we should at least learn Psalmody; but the incurable defects of my voice and ear soon drove my teacher to despair.' To this teacher he pays a warm tribute in a footnote, crediting him with ample professional ability and accomplishment, but expressing surprise at the persistency with which he held to the contention that, if his pupil did not understand music, it was because he did not choose to learn it. The singing-lessons, on Scott's showing, must have had a thrilling effect. 'When he attended us in George's Square,' the affectionate pupil recalls, 'our neighbour, Lady Cumming, sent to beg the boys might not be all flogged precisely at the same hour, as though she had no doubt the punishment was deserved, the noise of the concord was really dreadful.' Alexander Campbell (author of 'An Introduction to the History of Poetry in Scotland') was the musical tutor, and in the 'Life,' chap. iii., Lockhart refers to him as the editor of 'Albyn's Anthology.' Scott makes special allusion to the author's work 'A Tour in Scotland,' and he eulogizes him as 'an enthusiast in Scottish music,' which, he adds, 'he sang most beautifully.' There are several references to him in Scott's 'Familiar Letters.' No doubt, e.g., he is the musician mentioned in the letter to Terry, in i. 365, where the subject is the dramatized version of 'Guy Mannering.' Again, in a letter to Lady Abercorn, at p. 374 of the same volume, he is definitely described as 'a poor man called Campbell, a decay'd artist and musician, who tried to teach me music many years ago.' The index to the 'Familiar Letters' has the references to these passages under the name of Thomas Campbell, author of 'The Pleasures of Hope.' The allusion in the letter to Lady Abercorn will cause no trouble, but the inexperienced reader may have some difficulty about the authoritative person, simply named Campbell, who is associated with the songs included in Terry's version of 'Guy Mannering.' There is a good account of Campbell in Chambers's 'Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen.'

The nine weeks' season of the Moody-Manners Opera Company at Drury Lane ended on July 23. Mr. Manners hopes to establish permanent English opera in London, but we doubt whether he has shown himself quite equal to the task; in other words, whether he understands exactly what would draw the London public. He has given English operas of the old ballad type, and no doubt they appeal to a certain section of the community, but he made them too prominent a feature of his scheme. He has given modern operas by Verdi and Gounod, but in so doing ran danger of comparison with Covent Garden. Wagner was included in the scheme, and the revival of 'The Flying Dutchman' deserves mention, for the master's work in which distinct foreshadowings of his later and riper style are manifest, has been strangely neglected of late. For his next season we would suggest a more comprehensive programme, the revival of some classical and genuine comic operas by such composers, for instance, as Cherubini or Auber; also to give, if possible, one or two British novelties. But Mr. Manners deserves hearty congratulation on his plucky achievements at Drury Lane, and we hope that he will be encouraged to continue his efforts in the cause of English Opera.

The meeting of the Musical Defence League, held in Queen's Hall on July 4, and of which we give a report (from the Standard) in another column, was a great success. Its object was 'to take steps to secure proper protection for musical copyright and for the suppression of music piracies.' The Duke of Argyll, who presided, was ably supported by a strong platform, the most distinguished composers showing their practical interest in the matter by their personal attendance and weighty utterances. Dr. W. H. Cummings, who had not an opportunity of speaking at the meeting, has sent us the following communication, which will be read with interest by reason of its absolute appropriateness to the subject :—

CHARLES DICKENS AS A PROPHET.

Dickens, in 'Nicholas Nickleby,' seems to have foreshadowed the attitude of a certain living M.P., who by his extraordinary obstruction in Parliament prevented the passing of a bill which would in some measure have dealt out justice to the street robbers of other men's brains. It will be remembered that the hero Nicholas, in want of employment, sought an interview with Mr. Gregsby, M.P., who required a private secretary and detailed the duties of the position as follows :—

'With regard to such questions as are not political,' continued Mr. Gregsby, warming, 'and which one can't be expected to care a damn about, beyond the natural care of not allowing inferior people to be as well off as ourselves, else where are our privileges? I should wish my secretary to get together a few little flourishing speeches of a patriotic cast. For instance, if any preposterous bill were brought forward for giving poor grubbing devils of authors a right to their own property, I should like to say, that I for one would never consent to opposing an insurmountable bar to the diffusion of literature among the people,—you understand? that the creations of the pocket, being man's, might belong to one man, or one family; but that the creations of the brain, being God's, ought as a matter of course to belong to the people at large—and if I was pleasantly disposed, I should like to make a joke about posterity, and say that those who wrote for posterity, should be content to be rewarded by the approbation of posterity; it might take with the house, and could never do me any harm, because posterity can't be expected to know anything about me or my jokes either—don't you see?'

'I see that, Sir,' replied Nicholas.

'You must always bear in mind, in such cases as this, where our interests are not affected,' said Mr. Gregsby, 'to put it very strong about the people, because it comes out very well at election times; and you could be as funny as you like about the authors, because I believe the greater part of them live in lodgings, and are not voters.'

Any addition to this exquisite piece of satire is unnecessary.

M. Massenet's opera 'Hérodiade' was produced at the Brussels Monnaie on December 19, 1881. The composer had offered his work to M. Vaucorbeil, director of the Paris Opéra, but other engagements prevented its acceptance. The success however of the opera at Brussels induced M. Carvalho to announce it at the Paris Opéra Comique, where it was performed on February 1, 1882, with Mme. Fidès-Devriès as Salomé, Mme. Tremelli as Hérodiade, and MM. Jean de Reszké and Maurel as Jean and Hérode respectively. The occasion had special interest in that M. de Reszké appeared for the first time as a tenor singer. It was for this performance that M. Massenet thoroughly revised his opera; in this its altered form, Hérodiade was revived at the Paris Théâtre de la Gaîté on October 21, 1903. After the success of the work at Brussels in 1881, Mr. Gye, in his opera prospectus (Covent Garden) of March, 1882, announced that 'Hérodiade' would be given 'if time should permit.'

A considerable time—twenty-two years—has been permitted to elapse however before the opera obtained a representation in England. This event took place at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, on July 6. Not only had the title of the opera been changed to ‘Salomé,’ but certain alterations had been made in the libretto in order to remove the natural objection in this country to operas founded on biblical subjects; the disguise, however, was very thin. ‘Hérodiade,’ or ‘Salomé,’ is not one of the composer’s best efforts, but it must be remembered that the work only represents him as he was a quarter of a century ago. The songs, ‘Il est doux, il est bon,’ and ‘Vision fugitive,’ strains well-known in the concert-room, are two of its most attractive numbers. The principal dramatis personæ at Covent Garden were Madame Calvé (Salomé), Madame Kirkby Lunn (Hesatoade), and MM. Dalmorès (Jean) and Renaud (King of Ethiopia). The piece was finely mounted, and the performance, under Herr Lohse’s direction, admirable.

One need never despair of finding lost or mislaid documents, even at the most unexpected moment and with startling surprise. A case in point was instanced by Sir Ernest Clarke in the interesting lecture he gave at the Musicians’ Company’s Exhibition (July 16) on ‘Music of the Country-Side.’ In the course of his discourse Sir Ernest said:—

For centuries all our chief battles (Hastings, the Battle of the Standard, and Crecy, to mention no others) were won by the prowess of our English archers, recruited of course from the country-side. The archers had an even greater triumph at Agincourt, and there was a song composed in honour of Henry V. on his victorious return from this campaign. It was known from Burney’s ‘History of Music’ (Vol. II., p. 383), and Stafford Smith’s ‘Collections of Ancient English Songs,’ 1779, that the words and music of this song were in the Pepysian Library at Magdalen College, Cambridge, but which Mr. Fuller Maitland announced in his recently published ‘English Carols of the Fifteenth Century’ were ‘no longer to be found in the Library.’ The Magdalen authorities could not unearth the document, and were particularly miserable thereat, as their continued retention of the Pepysian Library was—in view of the provisions of Pepys’s will—endangered if they lost books or documents from it!

Now it so happened that when only last Saturday I was at Cambridge, going, for the purpose of this lecture, through the five volumes of Ballads that are amongst the most interesting of the treasures of the Pepysian Library, Mr. Fuller Maitland was there also, and was looking over my shoulder as I was examining the volumes. Suddenly he stopped my hand, and lo! amongst the paper-broadsides was found the missing piece of vellum with the words and music, in the old notation, of the song on the Battle of Agincourt.

Mr. Fuller Maitland—himself a member of Trinity College, which had been appointed by Pepys’s will as what he called ‘a check’ upon Magdalen’s administration of the Library—announced this trouvaille with mixed feelings to the Master of Magdalen, from whose mind it doubtless removed a heavy if latent anxiety. I think, under the special circumstances, you will excuse me if I ‘spatchcock’ into my lecture this old-world song or hymn of the fifteenth century, which has for title ‘Deo Grätias Anglia, reddo pro Victoria,’ and the first of the six verses of which runs:—

Our King came forth from Normandy
With Grace and might of Chivalry
There God for him wrought marvellously
Wherefore England may call and cry
Deo Grätias.

I will ask Mr. Lidgey therefore kindly to play for us the Song of Agincourt, as it appears in Mr. Fuller Maitland’s ‘English Carols of the Fifteenth Century.’

At the Annual General Meeting of the Philharmonic Society, held on July 16, the new Board of Directors was elected for the year. It consists of the following gentlemen: Mr. Francesco Berger, Dr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Charles Gardner, Mr. Edward German, Sir Hubert H. Parry, Mr. Randegger, and Mr. William Shakespeare. We are informed that it is confidently expected no call will be made upon the guarantors of the season just ended—the ninety-second of the Philharmonic Society.

Preliminary particulars of two more Festivals have now come to hand—Gloucester and Cardiff. The programme of the Gloucester meeting—to be held from September 4 to 9—will include the following novelties, set forth in the order of their performances: Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Ivor A. Atkins); ‘A Song of Zion’ (John E. West); a Festival Hymn (C. Lee Williams); ‘The One Thing that availeth,’ a short oratorio (C. Hubert H. Parry); and ‘The Holy Innocents,’ an oratorio (A. Herbert Brewer). The more or less familiar works will comprise the ‘Messiah’ and Selection (Handel); ‘Elijah’ and ‘Hymn of Praise’ (Mendelssohn); Te Deum (Stanford); ‘The Time-spirit’ (Granville Bantock); Organ Concerto (C. H. Lloyd); German Requiem (Brahms); ‘The Apostles’ (Elgar), &c. Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, organist of Gloucester Cathedral, will occupy his usual place as conductor of this time-honoured Festival of the Three Choirs.

The hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Sand was duly celebrated in Paris last month. Not only through her friendship with Liszt and Chopin has her name been connected with music, but she wrote on the subject of the art. Her appreciation of Chopin, though somewhat extravagant, is not lacking in interest. She said: ‘His genius is the deepest and the one most imbued with feeling. He makes one instrument speak the language of the infinite . . . his individuality was more exquisite than that of Bach, more powerful than that of Beethoven, more dramatic than that of Weber . . . Mozart alone is superior to him, for he had in addition the calmness which health brings—i.e., life in all its fulness.’

The fourth Cardiff Triennial Festival is fixed for September 21, 22, 23 and 24. The novelties to be then and there presented are: a Welsh Rhapsody for Orchestra (German); ‘Eve’ (Massenet), for the first time in England; ‘In the East,’ a tone-poem for orchestra (Hervey); ‘John Gilpin,’ a choral ballad (Cowen); and ‘The Victory of St. Garmon’ (Harry Evans). In addition to the foregoing the scheme embraces performances of ‘Elijah,’ ‘The Hymn of Praise,’ the ‘Midsummer Night’s Dream’ music, ‘Samson and Delilah,’ ‘The Dream of Gerontius,’ ‘Faust’ (Schumann), ‘The Desert’ (Félicien David), Requiem (Verdi), Wagner selections, &c. Dr. Cowen will again discharge the duties of conductor. We gave a forecast of the Leeds Meeting—to be held October 5 to 8—in our June issue, thus completing the trio of Musical Festivals shortly to be held, doubtless with their usual success, in England.

Sir Walter Parratt sailed on July 16 for the Cape on an examination expedition in connection with the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. He expects to return home in October.

The sale-catalogue of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge of July 19, contained the following entry:—

Lot 177. HANDEL (G. F.) Musical Composer, b. 1685, d. 1759, Concertino, Nisi Dominus, à 5 Con. Violini, COMPOSER'S AUTOGRAPH SCORE, 13 pp. obl. folio [ca. 1707.]

* * * On the title the name is spelt 'Hendel.'

Through the courtesy of the eminent Auctioneers we were enabled to make leisured examination of this MS., with the result that we found it to be a violin part (1st and 2nd Violins) of Handel's 'Nisi Dominus,' and not a score. Moreover, it has every appearance of being in the handwriting of a copyist, and not that of Handel, or Hendel, as he spelt his name during his sojourn in Italy. This, however, more or less by the way. One thing the MS. proved: that the Gloria Patri sung at the Handel Festival of 1891 (from a copyist's score purchased by Dr. W. H. Cummings at one of Messrs. Sotheby's sales) is, without any doubt, the final movement of the 'Nisi Dominus' composed by Handel in 1707; and that the octavo edition of this Handelian Psalm, issued by Messrs. Novello and edited by Mr. T. W. Bourne, is therefore both complete and correct.

THE FOUNDATION STONE OF LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL.

Exceedingly impressive and successful was the musical service in connection with the laying of the foundation stone of the new Liverpool Cathedral by the King on July 19. Mr. F. H. Burstall, Cathedral organist, conducted a huge chorus of 1,000 voices, representative of the parish choirs of the diocese, the accompaniments being played by the band of the Grenadier Guards, under the direction of Mr. A. Williams. The Order of Service included the following music:—

Psalm 84, double chant in D Barnby.
Psalm 100, All people that on earth do dwell

Tune Old 100th.

Hymn, 'O God, our help in ages past, words by Dr. Isaac Watts, Tune St. Ann's... .. Dr. Croft.
Hallelujah Chorus (Messiah) Handel.
Final Amen F. H. Burstall.

The vast concourse of people, 7,000 in number, joined in singing the simple strains of hymns that are teeming with hallowed associations in the religious life of the nation.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Considerable éclat attended the inauguration—on July 5, by Prince Christian—of the new building which, by a fortuitous chain of circumstances, has now become the headquarters of the Royal College of Organists. The building itself, situated on the west side of the Royal Albert Hall, is not new. It was erected twenty-nine years ago at the cost of the late Sir C. J. Freake, and became in turn the home of the National Training School of Music and the Royal College of Music. The Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 have, upon petition, granted to the Council of the Royal College of Organists a long lease of the building, which has been swept and garnished ere its new tenants came into possession.

The proceedings on July 5 commenced with the reception of invited guests by the President of the College (Sir Frederick Bridge) and Lady Bridge. Upon the arrival of Prince Christian on the dais of the Lecture Hall, Dr. E. H. Turpin, the honorary secretary of the College, presented an address to His Royal Highness in which was set forth the history of the Institution and the means whereby its new habitation had been secured. After Prince Christian had declared the building open, Sir Walter Parratt performed Mozart's Fantasia in F minor on the new three-manual organ erected by Messrs. Norman and Beard.

Sir Frederick Bridge then proposed and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt seconded a vote of thanks to His Royal Highness, which, having been cordially responded to, was followed by a similar acknowledgment to the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 'for the gracious grant of the building.' This was proposed by Sir Hubert Parry and seconded by Dr. Warwick Jordan, and acknowledged by Lord Thring, one of the said Commissioners. The brilliant function—many of the company being arrayed in gorgeous apparel of high degree—contrasted with the first meeting held on November 23, 1863—not in aristocratic Kensington, but at Mullin's Hotel, Ironmonger Lane, in the City! May all success and increasing usefulness attend the College in its new and airy location at Kensington Gore.

The following is the specification of a new organ built by Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons, for the church of St. John the Divine, Tunbridge Wells, and opened by Sir Frederick Bridge on June 22:—

LICHFIELD DIOCESAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The nineteenth triennial festival of parish choirs took place in Lichfield Cathedral on June 30, under the experienced direction of Mr. J. B. Lott, Cathedral organist. Two services, morning and afternoon, were held, at which the music included Parry's Te Deum in D (a product of his Eton days), Dr. Tye's motet 'O come, ye servants of the Lord,' Stainer's evening service in B flat, and Goss's anthem 'Praise the Lord, O my soul.' Mr. H. Rose, assistant-organist of the Cathedral, rendered valued aid at the organ. The Lichfield Diocesan Choral Association is the oldest of its kind, the first festival having been held in Lichfield Cathedral on October 14, 1856.

CATHEDRAL CHOIR FESTIVAL AT RIPON.

The North-East Cathedral Choirs' Association—which includes the choirs of York, Durham, Ripon, and Wakefield—held their annual Festival in Ripon Cathedral on July 14, when special significance was given to the event by the circumstance that it happened to coincide with the celebration of the Tercentenary of the incorporation of Ripon, and the elevation of the Minster into a Collegiate Church. Possibly it was on this account that Mr. C. H. Moody, the energetic young organist of the Cathedral, was able to persuade the authorities to allow him to procure the help, for the first time in the Cathedral, of a full orchestra. The precedent thus set was a good one, and the fifty players, though not of course quite sufficient for so large an auditorium, produced a good effect in Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture and Elgar's 'Imperial March.' In the choral music the result was less satisfactory, chiefly because the acoustics of Ripon Cathedral afford a particularly hard nut to crack, but also because the two most important compositions provided some exceptional difficulties for an orchestra largely amateur in its composition—it consisted to a great extent of members of Mr. Noble's York Orchestra—and playing under a conductor whose beat was strange to them.

The two choral works that were performed afforded interesting and by no means hackneyed examples of ancient and modern music. They were Purcell's anthem, 'O sing unto the Lord a new song,' and Stanford's setting of the 46th Psalm, 'God is our hope and strength.' The latter is a very early work; it was written for and dedicated to the Cambridge University Musical Society, and produced at one of their May concerts in 1877. It shows distinct Brahmsian leanings, but is a really interesting and very musically work, well worth a revival which one hopes may be the precursor of others.

The choral singing was exceedingly good, the combined choirs producing an excellent body of tone, the quality of which was more especially realized in the verse-parts of the anthems which were allotted respectively to the York and Ripon choirs. A greater degree of precision was, as might be expected, attained in the 'Hallelujah' from 'Messiah,' which was sung at the close of the service, though its effect would have gained in dignity had it been less hurried. Unfortunately it was not found practicable to make much use of the organ in connection with the orchestra, even where its employment is intended, as in the coda of the 'In Memoriam' Overture; but it was undoubtedly wise to avoid the enhanced difficulty of securing precision which would have been involved, since the organist on the screen is so much out of touch with the performers in the nave that a strange player must find the difficulty of accompanying them almost insurmountable. Without very ample rehearsal, only the broadest and simplest effects are to be safely attempted under such conditions. Mr. Moody is, however, too full of artistic enthusiasm to be easily beaten, and one has little doubt that he will make the experience of this his first, and in many respects very successful, festival a stepping-stone to still more striking efforts, providing only that his ardour is not damped by lack of sympathy.

It is always interesting and pleasant to record and commend long and faithful services rendered by organists of all denominations. The latest instance that has come under our notice is the work of Mr. Eustace Button, J.P., who has recently resigned the organistship of the Congregational Chapel, Clevedon, Somerset, an honorary post he has held with credit to himself and the satisfaction of all concerned since the year 1856. Moreover he has scarcely missed a Sunday's duty, except an occasional holiday, during that long period of forty-eight years. Mr. Button has also rendered valuable service to Clevedon in various public-spirited capacities—e.g., as chairman of the Pier Company, the Gas Company, and the Water Company; vice-chairman of the Urban District Council; and as a member of the Board of Guardians. On August 2 Mr. Button will celebrate his seventy-fifth birthday. The occasion is one that calls for congratulations of no ordinary kind, considering the whole-hearted life-work of this venerable and much-esteemed organist.

DEVONSHIRE DIOCESAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Festival of the Devonshire Diocesan Choral Association was held in Exeter Cathedral on June 28. No fewer than thirty-five parish choirs, represented by 1,053 voices, took part in the service, this large force of singers being kept well in hand by Mr. T. Roylands Smith, conductor, and his four sub-conductors. The service (Magnificat and Nunc dimittis) was Blair in C, one which by its general unisonal style and direct treatment was well adapted to such an occasion. The Festival book contained much new music, e.g., chants to the Psalms and Canticles, specially composed by Dr. W. B. Gilbert, Dr. L. R. Amott, and Dr. J. C. Marks; an anthem by the Rev. Arnold Culley, 'Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace,' &c. The setting of the Te Deum was composed for the occasion by Dr. H. J. Edwards, of Barnstaple, to complete the Service in C begun for the Evensong Festival of 1892. Another novelty was the tune of the Processional hymn, a dignified setting of 'Up the stately hill of Sion,' by Mr. R. B. Moore, of Exeter. A quartet of brass from the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, with the effective organ-playing of Dr. Wood, the Cathedral organist, added to the efficiency of an inspiring service.

Dr. G. J. Bennett, organist of Lincoln Cathedral, has compiled a useful little Primer entitled 'The Choirboy's Elements of Music.' The book is of the note-book order, the information being concisely arranged and set forth in a practical fashion. An interesting and valuable feature of Dr. Bennett's compilation consists of the musical examples from anthems by English composers, ranging from Byrd to Parry, and including extracts from Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Brahms, and others. The Primer, which is No. 64 of the series published by Messrs. Novello, is one that will be found useful to choirmasters of churches and to those chorists who come under their influence and skilful training.

Messrs. Telford and Telford, of Dublin, have rebuilt the organ originally erected by them in 1875 for St. Patrick's Cathedral, Armagh. The instrument, to which pneumatic action has been added throughout, now consists of three manuals, fifty-four draw stops, and 2,453 speaking pipes. It possesses the most modern manipulative devices, and—as it stands in its handsome carved-oak case on the beautiful white marble gallery—the organ completes the architectural adornment of the west end of the Nave of the Cathedral.

Mr. T. R. Croger has resigned the honorary secretaryship of the Nonconformist Choir Union, a post he has held since its formation in 1888. During these sixteen years Mr. Croger has discharged his duties with rare zeal and fidelity,—part of the time as treasurer—and to his business capabilities and musical enthusiasm not a little of the past success of the Union is due.

A selection from Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Apostles' was sung in Lincoln's Inn Chapel on Sunday afternoon, July 10, under the direction of Mr. Reginald Steggall, who presided at the organ. The solo parts were sung by Master Sydney Sheppard, Mr. W. H. Webb, Mr. Charles Ellison, and Mr. Arthur Appleby.

SCHUBERT'S GREAT SYMPHONY IN C,

No. 10.*

BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

Andante—Allegro ma non troppo (C major).

Andante con moto (A minor and A major).

Scherzo—Allegro vivace (C major), and Trio (A major).

Finale—Allegro vivace (C major).

Though Schubert occupied a very low place in Vienna Society, was all but unknown during his short lifetime, and died at the early age of thirty-one, he has yet left more than 6000 songs, six Masses, a dozen Operas, ten Symphonies, with a mass of Sonatas, Quartets, and other miscellaneous music almost uncountable. He was one of many children of a poor Viennese schoolmaster. He never married; he was so poor that he often had not money enough to get a dinner; he had few friends above his own level; he never held a post, or had a settled income, even of the scantiest, for more than a few months; and yet he was not a dissipated man, but was fondly attached to his belongings, and the idol of his few friends; he rarely travelled, and his reading was scanty; in fact he was a heaven-born genius, who seemed to do everything by nature and nothing by art, and every hour and minute of whose life was more or less directly devoted to music. In person he was short and stout, and ordinary looking†; poorly clothed, probably with little manners, and certainly with the most modest and retiring disposition possible.

He was born in 1797, and died in 1828, the year after Beethoven. His life was passed in the same city with Beethoven, at the time that that great composer was producing year by year his most remarkable works. And yet, though he may thus be said to have lived in Beethoven's shadow, he composed the immense mass of music above enumerated, most of it of great beauty and of absolute individuality and originality, and which is now gradually being recognised by the world as hardly inferior to that of his great contemporary, though very different. He has been said to have been to Beethoven as a woman is to a man, and the comparison is a happy one. The two were but slightly acquainted; but Beethoven made acquaintance with some of Schubert's music on his death-bed, and with the sure eye of genius and experience recognised its transcendent qualities, and expressed his admiration for them.

The colossal Symphony in C forms the climax of Schubert's achievements in the department of orchestral music, and was almost the last work permitted him to do; it was composed or commenced in March, 1828, and he died in the following November. It is indeed the culminating work of Schubert's life. It may not have the peculiar, almost unearthly tone of wild, mystical, tender melancholy that marks the two symphonic movements in B minor (No. 8) and the Entr'actes in 'Rosamunde,' but it has a very large

* We have called this work 'No. 10' because, until the chain of evidence collected by the writer of this notice and published in The Athenæum of November 10th, 1881, has been disproved, it must be assumed that the 'Gastein Symphony,' written at that place in the summer of 1825, and therefore 'No. 9,' is still somewhere in existence. The discovery of Beethoven's two youthful Cantatas shows that one need never give up hope in such cases.

† These have been published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel in a splendid edition in ten volumes, edited by Dr. Mandyczewski, of Vienna, in the most scholarlike and accurate style, and with all the indexes and lists that the most exacting investigator could require. A considerable number of the songs were printed for the first time, and some of these are of very great interest.

‡ 'Ganz wie ein Fiaker'; exactly like a cabman—said Lachner to Mr. C. A. Barry.

§ We have Spau'n's testimony to the fact of Schubert having loudly regretted at Beethoven's death that Beethoven had always been so inaccessible, that he had never actually spoken to him. Catalog, Wiener Ausstellung, 1871, No. 28.

share of these ethereal qualities ; while there is about it a force and majesty, a luxuriance of life from beginning to end, a wealth of invention and a variety of treatment, a command over the resources of the orchestra, and a tremendous energy, which makes it one of the most astonishing productions in the whole répertoire of music. No doubt its length is a certain drawback to its general acceptance, but this is a drawback which disappears after a moderate acquaintance. Extension, or repetition, was a quality of Schubert's artistic nature as much as condensation was of Mozart's ; and we must take him as we find him, and be thankful for the possession. When he has invented a fine passage he never seems happy till he has had it over again, and made all his friends share in his good fortune. But to be long is not always to be tedious : and a piece of music, like a poem, may be long, because it contains a great number of fine themes treated with infinite variety and ever-fresh charm.

Shortly after the completion of this Symphony Schubert presented the MS. score to the Musik-Verein of Vienna, a national society for the encouragement of music, with which he had relations, and in whose library it still remains. By them it was tried ; but its difficulties, in the then state of musical execution, were found so great that, after a few rehearsals, it was laid aside, and remained on the shelf till the visit of Robert Schumann to Vienna, in 1838. He carried it off to Leipsic. Mendelssohn was at that time conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts, and to him Schumann communicated his discovery. The result was its performance and enthusiastic reception in Leipsic on March 22, 1839. 'We recently,' says Mendelssohn in a letter* of April 4, 1839, to Moscheles, 'played a most remarkable and interesting Symphony by Franz Schubert. It is, without doubt, one of the best works we have lately heard. Bright, fascinating, and original throughout, it stands quite at the head of his instrumental works.' Its publication by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel followed in January, 1850. Its first performance in England was at the Crystal Palace in 1856, since which date it has been frequently played there and elsewhere.†

I. Andante—Allegro ma non troppo.

The Symphony opens according to Schubert's usual plan, with an Introduction, Andante, commencing with a romantic passage for the horns alone, like—

'The horns of Elf-land faintly blowing' of the poet :—

No. 1. Andante.
Horns alone.

This melody forms the subject of the introductory movement, seventy-seven bars in length. The strain just quoted is repeated by the oboes, clarinets, and bassoons. And this again is followed by a second strain of the melody in the strings, given out by the violoncellos, with a rich accompaniment, and ending in E minor—for so early in the piece has Schubert's imagination begun to run away with him :—

No. 1a.
Cellos.

This is followed by a passage of some thirty bars for the full orchestra, formed on the first two bars of the original theme (No. 1), and gradually settling on A flat, phrase answering phrase, and the trombones coming into truly noble play. From A flat an easy and natural transition is made back to C and to the original melody, played by oboes, clarinets, and bassoons, with an effective pizzicato moving bass, and a triplet accompaniment in the violins, in the following manner :—

No. 1b. Wood-wind.

Here again Schubert's fancy excites him, and leads him to extend the melody much beyond its original limits.

It is impossible not to be struck by the splendid colour, the variety, the incessant interest, and the volume of sound of this Introduction, produced without the use of a single extra instrument. It leads by an immense crescendo into the Allegro, of which the principal theme, divided between the strings and the wind, is as follows :—

No. 2. Allegro ma non troppo.
Strings.

* 'Letters of F. Mendelssohn to Ignaz and Charlotte Moscheles. Translated by Felix Moscheles' London, 1888.

† The fact has been revealed that the Parts were sent to London by Mendelssohn in 1839, but that owing to a great number of delays they were not performed by the Philharmonic Society till 1871. (Mr. F. G. Edwards, in THE MUSICAL TIMES of February, 1896, p. 83.)

Out of the above grow subsidiary phrases—this :—

—and this, with the marked emphasis of its third bar :—

—which takes a very important part in the movement.

The 'second subject' proper is a complete contrast to the first, in both melody and harmony. It is in E minor instead of G, as the ordinary rules of symphonic form would demand :—

No. 5. Oboes & Bassoons.

The rhythm of this theme has a very determined influence on the rest of the movement, throughout which its peculiar accent is almost constantly heard in one part or other of the orchestra :—

—and so on.

The trombones are employed with great effect in a phrase from the subject in the Introduction :—

—to which a new interest is imparted by the manner in which, after a few repetitions, the phrase is hurried up to the fortissimo :—

In fact, the independent manner in which the trombones comport themselves throughout the movement, especially towards the close, in the più moto, is very striking, and, as far as the writer is aware, absolutely original. Here is an instance—from the Coda :—

Schumann has used them in a somewhat similar manner, in a magnificent passage in the Finale to his First Symphony (1841), but the idea is certainly due to Schubert, as indeed no one would have been more anxious to acknowledge than Schumann himself. The solemn and unearthly sound of this grand instrument, 'Tuba mirum, spargens sonum,' which Mendelssohn thought 'too sacred' for indiscriminate use—suited the mystical religious genius of these two imaginative composers.

A melody of broad character appears shortly before the close of the first part of the Allegro, and again at the corresponding place near the end of the movement—and nowhere else. During a portion of it the basses have the marked rhythm of the first theme (see No. 2).

In the second part of the movement, at the close of the working out, a very original passage occurs—preceding the return of the principal subject in the original key—which is founded on the phrase quoted as No. 8, and will be recognised from its first few bars, and from its recalling a part of Schubert's grand and mystical song of the 'Junge Nonne' :—

But indeed the whole movement is crowded both with delicate strokes of detail and broad massive effects, which must strike every hearer. The Coda—più moto—is no longer than the Introduction (116 bars). It concludes with the first theme of all—that given out at the beginning by the horns (No. 1, above)—but on this occasion fortissimo and ben marcato.

II. Andante con moto.

If the Symphony be, as Schumann suggests, intended to be a representation of gipsy life, then the lovely melody with which this portion opens is surely a gipsy tune. After a few bars in the strings, to settle the ear in the key, and to suggest the figure of the coming melody, the oboe starts as follows in A minor :—

This is repeated with a trifling variation and with the addition of the clarinet, and then the oboe continues with the following delicious phrase in the major :—

This is succeeded by a passage of a loud and angry character, which here and elsewhere acts as a foil to the quiet charm of the theme quoted. After this the original theme recurs. A modulation then takes place in F major, in which key the second subject appears pianissimo :—

No. 14.
Viol. 1.
Viol. 2

This, after some time, and after the most various turns of melody, exchanged and partaken in turn by wind and string with ravishing effect, closes with a passage of the greatest originality and beauty :—

No. 14a.
Horns. pp
dim.
Strings. pp
dim.

Nothing can surpass the delicacy of the combination of the strings alone with the voice of the horn, which seems to hesitate and falter as if it were the speech of a human being. Nowhere, perhaps, is such a mystic, almost supernatural, atmosphere produced in music. It is, as Schumann has beautifully said, 'as if a celestial visitant were moving about the orchestra, and all the instruments had stopped to listen.' This passage closes the first section of the Andante, and then the working-out begins in A minor, with the original theme (No. 12) in the trumpet (an instrument rarely so distinguished), the horn and the violin :—

No. 14b.
Oboe.
Trumpet. pp
Horn. pp
Viol. pp
Oboe.

The rhythm of the accompaniment is maintained for a considerable time, with combinations of the greatest beauty between the various instruments. A striking effect is produced by a solo on the violoncello, accompanied in the manner of a duet by the oboe, and beginning pianissimo in the strings only, after the loudest possible crash from the whole orchestra. After this the key changes to A major, and the melody just quoted (No. 14) re-appears in a new key and with entirely new treatment; then the horn passes (with a difference); and at last the movement concludes, longingly and lingeringly, with the same tune with which it opened. Without quoting the entire score it is impossible to describe a tenth part of the beauties and merits of this most delicious Andante. The grace and tenderness of the themes must strike everyone; but to this is added a skill in the treatment of the orchestra, and a variety in the accompaniments at each return of the tune, which add a charm where it would almost seem impossible. We have just quoted one instance, the following is another :—

No. 15.
Viol. 1.

Clarinet (in Bb).

Schubert always shows his love for his wind instruments, and the way in which the flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons 'talk and intertalk' throughout this Andante equals, if it does not surpass, the similar passages which are so delightful in the earlier Symphonies and the 'Rosamunde' Entr'actes.

III. Scherzo and Trio—Allegro vivace.

The Scherzo here has lost its primitive meaning of a 'joke,' and has become an independent movement, equal in importance to the other three, and of the large dimensions given it by Beethoven in his Eroica No. 7, or No. 9. I will content myself with a few quotations from it, and with calling attention to one subsidiary passage, for a reason which will then appear. The following will give an idea of the opening :—

—which is succeeded by another theme of a broader character in the strings :—

No. 17.

—accompanied in the clarinets and bassoons by the original theme (No. 16). The close imitation between the first violins and violoncellos will not escape the careful listener.

The subsidiary passage just alluded to is a delicious melody, which, after being suddenly introduced by the flute in the key of C flat, is then repeated note for note by the oboe and violin a semitone higher with admirable effect :—

The passage strongly resembles that in the Scherzo of Schubert's Octet, but it is no less all his own, and quite native to the place.

The Trio, ushered in by several bars of recurring notes in horns, clarinets, &c., consists of a fine broad melody, played by the wind instruments with a very rich effect, and accompanied by strings :—

The second section is in the same noble vein :—

No. 18b.

—and amongst other beauties contains a prominent solo for the alto trombone, beginning on the high A. After the Trio, the Scherzo is repeated.

IV. Finale—Allegro vivace.

The Finale forms an astonishing climax to all that has preceded it. Two things strike one on the first hearing ; first, its wonderful impetuosity and resistless force—it is really difficult to understand how any man can have had such a volcanic piece of music inside him, without bursting ; and secondly, the very marked character of its rhythm. There are few movements, even of Beethoven's, in which the rhythm is so evident and irresistible. The opening bars, after the first sonorous clang, have a nobility like that of Olympus itself, and seem to give a foretaste of the restless energy of what is coming :—

No. 19. Tutti.

These are the triplets which are said to have made the Philharmonic Band burst out laughing when Mendelssohn rehearsed the Symphony with them in 1844 ; a very unfortunate bit of merriment, since it naturally enraged Mendelssohn, and caused him to keep back his 'Ruy Blas' Overture from the English public. 'No, gentlemen,' said he, when 'Ruy Blas' was called for by the band, 'since you won't hear Schubert you shall certainly not hear me.' After this introductory passage, a melody, which may be called the first subject of the movement—oboes and bassoons, with the violins in unison in triplets—fairly runs away with the hearer :—

No. 20.
Oboes.

After a time we come to a new feature—the 'second subject' of the movement, in the key of G, preceded by four marked notes in the horns, and itself consisting of four bars of minims succeeded by four bars of crotchets—always accompanied by the never-ending triplets in the violins. It is curious to notice how the introduction of the four minim bars increases the mad rush of the movement. But indeed everything helps it. The untiring bass, incessantly on the move from the top to the bottom of the scale :—

No. 22.

—the restless figure :—

—acting like a goad on the already furious mass ; the triplet (a No. 20) first, and the dotted crotchet (b No. 21), each like a changing or tripping step—all contribute to the hurry and the flight.

Another part of the second subject, still in the key of G, on a pedal D in the bass, is as follows :—

—with a strong relationship to the theme of the Finale of Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

Shortly after this, and towards the end of the first half of the Finale, there is a very beautiful passage where the basses go gradually down through two octaves, the force of the sound diminishing at the same time, from the full orchestra fff to the simple quartet of strings. The first half of the movement closes with a modulation into E flat, and the clarinets, in a tone which makes one shiver, begin the 'working-out' with the second subject (No. 24), so cast as to recall more distinctly than before the passage alluded to in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. Here again the trombones are used in an entirely original manner, of which even Beethoven has left no instances. Such a passage as the following must have been indeed a novelty to the trombone players of 1828 :—

—in fact, what Beethoven did for the drum, Schubert has in this Symphony done for the trombones. Formerly they were used for effect, to deepen a shadow here, or to bring out a spot of bright colour there, or to double the parts in choral music ; but he has released them from that subordinate position, and given them independent parts of their own, and a new office in the great family of the orchestra.

But to return to our Finale. The development of the second subject goes on for a time, but soon the four minims begin to force their way in, the violin triplets follow, and the movement starts once more, never to rest for more than a moment or two till it has rushed to its final catastrophe. As we near the close the tremendous significance of the four minims—fz, fz, fz, fz—appears ; and the manner in which they return to the Unison C however widely the intervening notes have wandered, and repeat their four dreadful strokes, like the blows of some direful instrument of destruction, is truly extraordinary. The Coda begins with a long crescendo commencing ppp and containing four progressive sections of twenty bars each, increasing uniformly in force, ppp, pp, p, mf, until the final climax and crash of all is reached.

What was said of the Introduction is true of the whole Symphony, and especially of the Finale. Great as are its musical qualities, it is remarkable for the extraordinary fulness of its sound, which before the close seems really to saturate the hearer.

Three Pieces for Children. By Hubert G. Oke.

Valse Brillante. By W. H. Reed.

Three Miniatures. By A. von Ahn Carse.

Mr. Franklin Taylor's edition of 'Progressive Studies for the Pianoforte' is too well-known to need fresh commendation, but the value of the series has now been still further considerably enhanced by the addition of three new numbers devoted to compositions by Arnold Krug. Most teachers now agree that the best and quickest technical results are obtained by the oft-repeated practice of short exercises, graded in degree of difficulty and severally applied to some one special object. Hence we find each of these new books furthering the principle of working systematically, through a well-organized plan, at a technic-speciality. Book 54 contains forty-seven studies, varying in length from one to four bars and intended to be repeated from ten to twenty times each, admirably adapted for the cultivation of the wrist in staccato passages of single and double notes. Book 55 gives sixty-six ingenious little exercises for facilitating independence of the fingers. The first forty-eight are for each hand alone, whilst the last eighteen practise them together. Book 56 has twenty-two preliminary studies in playing polyphonic music. The first numbers are short and simple and in two parts only ; but as they proceed more complex examples in three and four parts are added. Nothing could better prepare a student for the study of Bach's Inventions and Fugues than these well-designed exercises. The author has written them in various keys and rhythms ; but a further great advantage will be derived by transposing as many of them as possible into other keys.

Appropriate in every respect to their purpose are 'Three Pieces for Children,' by Mr. Hubert G. Oke, entitled 'Dolly's Lullaby,' 'A Rainy Day,' and 'Swing Song.' Although containing no special difficulty, the children who perform these charming trifles must needs have at least passed beyond the initial stage of pianoforte playing. The pieces are excellently phrased and fingered, and may be warmly recommended to teachers.

Mr. W. H. Reed's 'Valse Brillante' for orchestra has been arranged as a pianoforte solo, and in this guise it makes a showy concert- or drawing-room piece.

'Three Miniatures,' by Mr. A. von Ahn Carse, deserve a word of praise. No. 1, 'Humoresque,' requires neatness of fingering, especially in the left hand, for its due execution. No. 2, 'Love Song,' forms a pleasing contrast ; while No. 3, 'Scherzetto,' is as merry a little movement as could well be desired.

Hamlet. Symphonic poem. By Edward German.
Arranged for Pianoforte Duet by Arthur E. Grimshaw.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Edward German wrote this work for the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1893, when it was produced and elicited much favourable criticism. There are good reasons for this, for, although the composer has sought to present the dominating emotions of Hamlet, Ophelia and the King, there is nothing mystic or involved in the music ; hesitancy and doubt can be expressed with decision and clearness, and Hamlet's proneness to these moods are easy to follow in Mr. German's work. The theme for Ophelia is admirably suggestive of the gentleness and pathetic experiences of the unfortunate lady, and the theme associated with the King is equally significant. These subjects are noted in the pianoforte arrangement by Mr. Grimshaw, who has executed his by no means easy task with manifest care to preserve the salient characteristics of the music.

First system of the musical score. It consists of four vocal staves (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and a piano accompaniment. The vocal parts have lyrics: "Of . . hope - - less love, I keep a - way, of hope-less love, I". The piano part has dynamics f, dim., and fp. The key signature is three flats (B-flat major or D-flat minor) and the time signature is 4/4.

Te Deum and Benedictus in B flat. By Walter G. Alcock.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The talented organist to His Majesty's Chapel Royal has taken for the opening theme of his setting of the Te Deum an ancient plain-song phrase known as Vexilla Regis, and its sturdy character, induced by its apparent independence of tonality, imparts a peculiar dignity to his music. We are glad to note that the conventional and somewhat tricky device of setting the verse 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth,' pianissimo, has been discarded in favour of the delivery of the words fortissimo—a much more rational proceeding, since it is stated in the preceding verse that the cry is given by 'The Heavens and all the Powers therein.' The verse 'When Thou tookest upon Thee' is set for basses in unison, an impressive effect being produced by a change to the key of the flattened sixth of the scale of B flat, the prevailing tonality. Later on there are some other effective harmonic transitions which show that the composer is fully alive to the importance of a good, sound tonal scheme. Mr. Alcock also makes good use of passages in imitation, particularly in his treatment of the Benedictus. The music to this is somewhat lighter in character than that to the great Eastern hymn, but it is an excellent example of the blending of ancient and modern orthodox methods. The settings require a well-trained choir of capable vocalists, but the compositions present no excessive difficulties. The organ accompaniment is interesting, and greatly contributes to the effectiveness of the setting.

To One in Paradise. Song. Words by Edgar Allan Poe. Music by Sir Arthur Sullivan.

Behind the Silver of the Moon. Song. Words by Fred. E. Weatherly. Music by J. L. Molloy.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

It is not always kind to give to the world that which a composer withheld in his lifetime, but the melancholy interest attached to posthumous works is so great, and in some cases such treasures have been discovered, that there is little probability of the practice being suppressed. 'To One in Paradise' may indeed be pleaded as a justification for its continuance, for the American poet's words have been set by the late composer for a tenor voice with a directness and melodic simplicity that intensify their pathos, and it would certainly have been regrettable if a song of so much artistic truth had been suffered to remain in oblivion.

'Behind the Silver of the Moon' is, in Mr. Weatherly's philosophy, the land where we shall one day find all the happy hours of our childhood, and maybe those that came to us later and vanished all too soon. The song is a dainty, pleasing fancy, with music that seeks to echo the sentiment of the words, and shows the well-known composer in his best and most refined style. It should be added that an organ obbligato is provided for the last verse.

Song to Pan. Part-song. By Herbert W. Wareing.

Cradle Song. Part-song. By Arthur Stenz.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The god Pan has been the cause of much music, and composers to-day seem just as inclined to pay him homage as did their forefathers. The words of this particular 'Song to Pan' are taken from 'The faithful Shepherdess,' by Beaumont and Fletcher, who declare that the sylvan god is great and just, and must be honoured by much repetition of 'Fa, la, la,' and by the entwining of vocal parts, not difficult to sing and pleasant to hear. Cradle songs are inevitably very much like one another, but their heritage is a tenderness and grace that ever appeals, and these attributes are possessed in notable degree by Mr. Stenz's music. If he be a singer himself we should be inclined to hazard the opinion that he is a tenor, but be this as it may, tenors who take up this song will feel grateful to the composer for the effectiveness of his music.

Obituary.

We regret to place on record the following deaths:—

On June 27, quite suddenly, at 6, Webster Gardens, Ealing, Dr. CHARLES GARLAND VERRINDER, a former chorister of Salisbury Cathedral and a pupil of Sir George Elvey. Dr. Verrinder was organist successively of Holy Trinity, Windsor, 1854; St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London, 1856; Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, 1866; St. Michael's, Chester Square, 1877; St. Mary's, West Kensington, 1890, while for the last four years of his life he held the organistship of Ealing Congregational Church, of which the Rev. W. Garrett Horder is the minister. In 1859 he was also organist of the West London Synagogue of British Jews (the Reformed Synagogue). He composed a cantata 'Israel'; Hebrew services and Psalter; some Anglican church music; part-songs, songs, organ music, &c. In 1862 he took the degree of Bachelor of Music at Oxford, and was created a Doctor of Music by the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1873.

On July 13, at 12, Rathbone Place, Miss GIULIA WARWICK (whose real name was Julia Ehrenberg), aged forty-seven. She originally appeared in public as a pianist when only twelve years of age. This was in 1869, at St. James's Hall. Later on, when she found she had a voice, she studied under Madame Sainton Dolby and Mr. Manuel Garcia. Miss Warwick joined D'Oyley Carte's first Gilbert and Sullivan opera company in November, 1877, when she created the part of the charity girl Constance, in 'The Sorcerer.' She also rendered valuable service in the Carl Rosa and other opera companies. Upon her retirement from the stage she became a professor of singing at the Guildhall School of Music, and subsequently founded a vocal academy of her own.

On July 14, at Deal, after a long and painful illness, FRANK LEWIS MOIR, aged fifty-two. While an art student (painting) at Kensington he began to compose music, and gained a scholarship at the National Training School for Music. He composed a comic opera, 'The Royal Watchman,' much church music, madrigals, &c. But it is chiefly as a song composer that Mr. Moir made his name, his best known efforts in this direction being 'Only once more' and 'Best of all.'

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

No better proof of the vitality of the veteran Society could be adduced than the concluding concert of its 92nd season which took place on June 30 at Queen's Hall. It opened with the first performance in London of Mr. Edward German's 'Rhapsody on March Themes,' originally produced at the Norwich Festival of 1902. Re-hearing increased esteem for the work, which, under the direction of the composer, received an excellent rendering, and met with much applause. A peculiarly interesting feature of the evening was the revival of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, to which reference is made on page 518 of the present issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES. The movement so delighted the audience that its repetition was insisted upon, as at its first performance in 1829, a curious example of the continuance of the same taste, and, be it added, a proof of the captivating vitality of Mendelssohn's music. Of this truly fairy music Dr. Cowen secured a delightfully finished interpretation. Herr Kubelik, the soloist of the evening, was heard at his best in Lalo's graceful 'Spanish' Concerto for Violin, and the programme and season concluded with a performance of Schubert's great Symphony in C, worthy of the work and of the prestige of the venerable Society.

'The English Madrigal Choir' is the title of a new organization that is about to be formed at Leighton House, and that will devote its energies solely to the singing of English madrigals. Those wishing to join the choir—which is to be conducted by Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott—are invited to communicate with the honorary secretary, Mr. C. L. Stocks, 16, North Street, Westminster.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The usual term-end concert given by the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music took place at the Queen's Hall on July 21, when fresh proofs were given of the earnest endeavour and good training of the young people at Tenterden Street. Miss Hilda Peppercorn gave a clever interpretation of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, and Miss Gladys Clark in M. Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso showed considerable command of the violin. The most promising of the vocalists was Miss Gwladys Roberts, the possessor of a rich-toned contralto voice, who moreover articulated with commendable distinctness. This latter valuable accomplishment was also a distinctive feature of the singing of Mr. Philip Simmons, who sang with much taste two songs respectively entitled 'The Three Shadows' and 'To one I love,' by Mr. Archibald Tester, a fellow student. Other vocalists who merit encouragement were Miss Edith H. Coish and Mr. Marcus Thomson. Some praiseworthy work was also done by the Ensemble Class under the direction of Mr. Willy Hess. A notice of the Prize-giving function will be found on page 536.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Of the making of concert programmes, as of books, there is no end. Yet too often there is as little art displayed in the one as in the other. It might be worth considering whether the art should not be taught as are singing and playing, and as conducting should be, but we fear is not yet, taught in our music schools. Be that as it may, those students of the Royal College of Music who are wide awake enough to take an interest in a subject which may concern them greatly in after life had a valuable object-lesson in the pupils' concert given at the College on July 21, when the programme proved a cunningly and effectively arranged bouquet of classic, romantic, and contemporary, orchestral, choral, solo vocal and solo instrumental music. It even included the art of to-day, the 'hot roll' (frischgebackene Bemme), as Brahms called it, of this morning. This was an orchestral Suite in three movements by James Friskin (Scholar), a bright and attractive little work which testified to the young composer's gifts in no uncertain manner. He has charming ideas, and has learned how to express them and what to do with them. Their treatment is sound and fanciful, the scoring effective in a quiet though by no means colourless way, and in the last movement (Tema con variazioni) ingenuity of invention is allied to feeling which has the appearance of being spontaneously expressed. The young composer has views, occasionally his own, on orchestration, and though his effects will not yet set the Thames on fire, they nearly all 'come off,' to use the jargon of the orchestral specialist. The work was received with a degree of enthusiasm that suggested the birth of a veritable masterpiece. Let us hope the hero of the 'overwhelming reception' will live it down and keep a level head. The young composer achieved a second success with a smooth and distinctly musical performance of the solo part in Beethoven's G major Pianoforte Concerto. Maria Yelland sang the 'Inflammatus' from Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater.' She has a powerful voice of good quality, but the energetic, almost assertive, way in which she ejaculated the words made us wonder whether she understood their meaning. The difficult 'Chorus of Flower Maidens' from Act II. of 'Parsifal' was brightly and lightly sung by the Choral Class, though the complex pattern of Wagner's vocal polyphony stood out none too clearly.

The orchestra was not up to the usual standard of the Royal College of Music. There was apparent a vast deal of 'spirit,' but also a degree of roughness, especially in the strings, which greatly interfered with the enjoyment of the Concerto and Schumann's C major Symphony (No. 2), which closed the evening's music. May we draw attention to the very cacophonous 'tuning' in which the players indulge between the movements of a work? The irritating habit is becoming a veritable nuisance, when between two works, and even during the pauses dividing the movements, we hear snatches of other works (not even in the programme!) played with, and travestied by individual players in the orchestra. The time has come to utter a protest against a proceeding as inartistic as it is unworthy of a great Music School.

MASTER FLORIZEL VON REUTER.

Shortly after the début in this country of Master Vecsey there came rumours of the achievements of a still more marvellous prodigy in Master Florizel von Reuter, a young gentleman who was said to be not only as wonderful a violinist as the other little boy, but a composer and conductor to boot, and at the age of twelve! No wonder therefore that a large audience, which included Queen Alexandra, gathered together in Queen's Hall on June 29 full of expectancy not unminged with curiosity at the first appearance in England of this prodigy violinist-composer-conductor.

When after the performance of Beethoven's 'Fidelio' Overture under Dr. Cowen's direction Master Reuter made his appearance, he was found to be a slight but well-built boy with a fair complexion and flaxen curly hair, as great a contrast to the dark and sturdy Master Vecsey as could be conceived. When he began to play in Vieuxtemps's Violin Concerto in E it soon became manifest that his tone was less full, and that he was more conscious of his efforts than his juvenile rival. His technical facility was astounding, but that which most prominently manifested itself was his keen sense of rhythm and accentuation. Expressive passages were rendered with great refinement, and rapid staccato notes and runs were executed with a fascinating crispness and clearness that attested to extraordinarily developed nervous energy in one so young.

The sensational moment of the afternoon however came when the lad took up the baton to conduct his Symphony in F sharp minor, and when he sharply tapped the desk to call the huge orchestra of matured musicians to attention, the sight was so strange and partook so much of the incongruous that a ripple of subdued merriment went through the hall. Scarcely less amusing was it to note the punctilious care with which the boy gave the leads at the entrances of the various instruments and his energetic gestures when he approached a climax. It seemed a scene of topsy-turvydom! The Symphony is chiefly remarkable for its thematic material, the principal subjects not only being melodious and significant, but symphonic in character. It need scarcely be added that the performance of this boyish creation elicited enthusiastic applause, and after Master Reuter had subsequently been heard in Max Bruch's 'Scottish Fantasia' an extra piece was demanded.

Master von Reuter made his second and third appearances at violin recitals given at St. James's Hall on July 6 and 16 respectively. On the former occasion his programme included M. Saint-Saëns's Third Concerto and Bach's First Sonata with clavier accompaniment, while at his third recital he played a pretty little piece of his own entitled 'Ein Lied' which, in common with his Symphony, bore witness to his power to invent pleasing melody.

MUSICAL DEFENCE LEAGUE.

(From the Standard, July 5, 1904.)

The Duke of Argyll presided last night at a public meeting held in the Queen's Hall, at Langham Place, with the object of taking steps 'to secure proper protection for musical copyright, and for the suppression of musical piracies.' Among those present were Mr. W. A. Mount, M.P., Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., Sir C. Hubert H. Parry (Royal College of Music), Sir A. C. Mackenzie (Royal Academy of Music), Dr. W. H. Cummings (the Incorporated Society of Musicians), with representatives of a number of other musical and publishing organizations.

The chairman, in opening the proceedings, said that if in three years 3,000,000 pirated copies had been seized, it was not the tenth part of what had been sold, and, assuming that each piece would have brought threepence, the loss to the musical profession amounted to no less than £37,000. It was no wonder, therefore, that some remedy should be demanded for such a state of things. It might be said that we ought not to interfere with those who sold the music in the streets; but, first of all, our sympathies ought to be with those by whom the music was provided (applause).

Mr. William Boosey read or mentioned a number of letters that had been received from persons of note, who sympathised with the object of the meeting, but were unable to be present, among these being Lords Knutsford, Lytton, and Lathom, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, M.P., Mr. Stuart-Wortley, M.P., and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P.

Mr. W. A. Mount, M.P., moved a resolution to the effect that, owing to the deplorable condition of the music and art industry of this country, through the depredations of music pirates, the Government should be earnestly petitioned to give facilities for the passing of the Musical Copyright Bill of the present Session. The mover maintained that the existing Act was no adequate remedy for the evil of which the composers of music complained. The Bill now before Parliament had received a great deal of discussion in the Standing Committee of the Commons, and in Committee of the whole House had received general support, being only defeated thus far by the obstruction of one or two Members (cries of 'Shame.')

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., and supported by Sir C. Hubert H. Parry, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Sir Edward Elgar, the Hon. Harry Lawson, Mr. John Murray, Mr. Stephen Adams, Mr. C. W. Bowerman, Mr. David Day, and other gentlemen. It was carried by acclamation, and the proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks to the Duke of Argyll for presiding.

ELGAR'S 'APOSTLES' IN YORK MINSTER.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

On purely æsthetic grounds—and these are all that need concern my present purpose—there can be no question of the supreme fitness of a cathedral nave for the performance of oratorio. If there be any virtue in an appropriate environment, it must surely be felt when music whose theme is religion is heard in a temple dedicated to religious worship, where a thoughtful demeanour is second nature, where decorous behaviour is customary, and where distracting applause is not tolerated. There are serious practical difficulties to be faced, it is true; it would be absurd to minimize them, and it is not often possible to avoid or evade them, as was done on the memorable occasion when Sir Edward Elgar's most recent oratorio, 'The Apostles,' was given for the first time in a church—an event which took place on June 29, in York Cathedral. Anyone who enters the nave of York Cathedral, the vastest in this country, must feel how it lends itself to musical effects of a grandiose description. This was realized in the old times of the Yorkshire Festivals, but for something like three-quarters of a century there had been no festival, or even oratorio performance on festival scale, until this recent occasion of which I write. The chorus was, indeed, of very similar calibre; the orchestra, however, fell short in numbers of the instrumental forces employed in the old days, though probably the seventy or eighty players, mostly London artists, went far to make up by their superior efficiency what they lacked in numerical strength.

I have before me a volume of the programmes of the second Yorkshire Festival, that of 1825, and it may be interesting to quote from them a few of the particulars which they record with praiseworthy exactitude. In passing, the reader may be reminded that Crosse's handsome folio volume deals with the 1823 Festival, which was on a similar scale, though apparently not quite so extensive. In 1823 the chorus numbered 285, the band 180; whereas in 1825 the numbers were respectively 350 and 250. This makes a sufficiently imposing force, but, as regards the power of the band, it is well to remember that a large majority of the players were gathered from all parts of the English provinces, and that the standard of orchestral playing was then much lower than it is now. When we turn to the programme, however, it will be seen that a far lower standard of efficiency would suffice. Handel's music, the idiom of which is not so varied that it should afford many stumbling blocks even in 1825, formed by far the largest part of the cathedral programmes. The whole of 'Messiah' and a selection from 'Judas Maccabeus' were given, while the 'grand selections of sacred music'—this undignified way of recommending a programme by styling it 'grand' has not yet died out in Yorkshire—were full of Handelian extracts. Let me just summarize the Gargantuan 'Selection' given on the fourth morning, Friday, September 16, 1825. Of Handel there was heard the 'Dettingen' Te Deum, Coronation and Funeral Anthems, and pieces from 'Solomon,' 'Deborah,' 'Saul,' 'Theodora,' 'Joshua,' 'Esther,' 'Jephtha,' 'Joseph,' 'Athaliah,' 'Redemption,' 'Israel in Egypt,' and 'St. Cecilia's Day.' The rest was a strange jumble. There were pieces by Haydn, Mozart, and Gaglielmi, presumably from Masses, but discreetly not so described, in deference to Protestant susceptibilities; others from Graun's Te Deum and Mozart's 'Requiem.' 'Luther's Hymn' was sung by Mr. Braham and the chorus, and Croft's 'St. Matthew' tune and Humphrey's familiar 'Grand Chant' had a place in this extraordinary olla podrida. One thing seems certain, that this broad, dignified music could hardly fail to be really impressive when given on a commensurate scale and in so magnificent a building. Perhaps as an illustration how 'history repeats itself' it may be worthy of mention that in 1823 the committee found it necessary to make a request 'respecting the disuse of high head-dresses,' while from the fact that it was almost universally obeyed we may perhaps assume that the sex was more amenable to discipline than it is usually found nowadays.

After making due allowance for the general advance in technical proficiency of musicians since those early days, it must be allowed, I think, that a more difficult task was provided in Sir Edward Elgar's music. Circumstances had, however, prepared the way for a successful performance. In the first place the financial obstacle—which otherwise might well have been practically insurmountable—was removed by the generosity of a gentleman who desired to remain anonymous, but whose name is an 'open secret,' and whose lavish support of the Leeds Choral Union is well known and appreciated in the West Riding. Having taken upon his shoulders the whole pecuniary responsibility of the undertaking, it became possible to give a complete performance, with full orchestra and able principals, of this very exacting work, free of any charge for admission. Entrance was obtained by free tickets, all of which, it is needless to add, were taken up long before the day of the performance, for Yorkshiremen are never so keen in their pursuit of pleasure as when it can be secured without cost. The seats were not numbered, and it speaks highly for everyone concerned that the big audience was seated with a minimum of anything approaching unseemliness.

The performers were stationed on a platform erected under the central tower, west of the choir screen, and rising from the level of the floor to a height of some four feet at the back. The elevation was of course not sufficient to produce the best possible effect acoustically, but the Dean and Chapter very properly feel keenly their responsibility as custodians of the Cathedral in regard to the practical danger in the erection of extensive temporary fittings in an ancient building. In one respect the Minster showed a great improvement. The new Walker organ on the screen has its console on the South side, instead of on the East, as in the old one, so that it can be employed for services in the nave as well as in the choir. While referring to the organ I must not forget to mention that it was employed with admirable discretion and excellent effect by Mr. T. Tertius Noble. As a rule I fail to understand why the organist should be singled out by large type in the programme and special mention in the criticism, apart from any other member of the orchestra, of which he as a rule supplies the one part that can legitimately be dispensed with—at least in modern oratorio; but Mr. Noble, as the chief musician of York Minster, deserves some special credit for self-abnegation in taking a less prominent place on the present occasion. The conductor was Mr. Alfred Benton, who naturally assumed that position as conductor of the Leeds Choral Union. The principals were Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Lilian Dews, Mr. Henry Brearley, Mr. Francis Harford, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, whose efforts were handicapped by their position, standing as they did hardly above the level of the audience. Mr. Black, however, did not fail to give due incisiveness to the part of Judas, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies's fine voice was really adequate to the difficult feat of filling York Minster—of the excellence of his interpretation there is nothing new to be said, save perhaps that it grows in impressiveness, being certainly more virile than when he first undertook it. The Leeds Choral Union, as was duly recorded in THE MUSICAL TIMES of last April, gave 'The Apostles' at Leeds on March 16, when three of the same principals took part in the performance, so that a familiarity was ensured without which an efficient performance in so strange and in some respects so difficult a place as York Minster would have been still more difficult of attainment. A sufficient volume of tone there was not, at least in the more grandiose or strenuous passages, but if the comparison may be allowed, I think the effect was decidedly better than when Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was heard in the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster. The band was certainly not sufficiently large in the string department, but it was significant that the harp, which had behind it one of the huge piers of the central tower, was quite effective. Placed on an elevated and rapidly rising platform, with a coved back to reflect and concentrate the sound, chorus, orchestra, and soloists would have been heard to infinitely greater advantage, and a glance at the plate opposite page 179 of Crosse's 'History of the 1823 Festival' shows how this arrangement can, and has been effected. Apart from purely musical results I am, however, bound to confess that the general æsthetic impression was none the less favourable from having the fine stone screen in view, and it must be admitted that in such a matter the surroundings mean a good deal as regards the ultimate impression. The chorus-singing was of a high order of merit. The singers knew their work, and the quality of their tone was excellent. Mr. Benton's temperament is not best suited to the interpretation of such frankly emotional music as Elgar's, but he is a thoroughly painstaking, conscientious musician, and deserves credit for the high degree of precision attained by his large and energetic chorus.

Will the object-lesson afforded by the performance have any further results? At any rate it demonstrated that, if pecuniary, ecclesiastical, and social difficulties can be adjusted, there is no inherent impossibility in resuscitating the ancient glories of musical festivals in York Cathedral.

HERBERT THOMPSON.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The annual distribution of prizes to students at this Institution took place at Queen's Hall on July 22. The presentations were made by Madame Melba. The musical portion of the programme included two Canons for female voices, by Frederick Corder, sung by a select choir, accompanied by seven harps and conducted by the composer; and Bach's Sonata in C major for two violins and figured bass, played by sixty violin students, with organ accompaniment by Mr. B. J. Dale. Sir Alexander Mackenzie then gave his annual address. Referring to the scholarships he said that he had an entirely new one to announce. Its conditions were, briefly, that the holders should have some connection by birth with natives or inhabitants of the Isle of Man, and that it was open to any branch of music. It would be called the Baume (Manx) Scholarship. Madame Melba had just intimated that she would give a prize (for the next five successive years), bearing her name, for the encouragement of singing in the English language, and she had chosen the English ballad as the medium best fitted to carry out her suggestion. The Principal also mentioned that at the first concert given under the auspices of the Palmer Trust fund in May last, quite a number of their talented students figured favourably in the programme.

The following awards have recently been made at this Institution:—The Charles Rube Prize (String Quartets), Ivy St. Aubyn Angove, Rowsby Woof, James T. Lockyer, and Walton O'Donnell. The Heathcote Long Prize (Pianoforte), Claude Gascoigne. The Frederick Westlake Memorial Prize (Pianoforte), Gladys Law. The Parepa-Rosa Prize (Sopranos), Ida Kahn. The Hannah FitzRoy Prize (Violin), Herbert J. Boden. The Charlotte Walters Prizes (Elocution), Carmel Goldsmid and Alberta Kavanagh. The Walter Macfarren Gold Medals (Pianoforte), Hubert Gascoigne and Winifred Christie.

Several important Scholarships and Exhibitions will shortly be competed for, particulars of which may be obtained upon application to the Secretary of the Institution.

Dr. Cuthbert Harris has been appointed to the conductorship of the Streatham Choral Society in succession to Mr. Stewart Macpherson.

The official report of the adjudicators of the Morecambe Musical Festival (held in April) has just been issued. Detailed criticism and marks fill a substantial pamphlet of forty-six pages. Sir Edward Elgar, who was one of the judges, contributes a characteristic letter. Therein he says:—

The choral singing is of the same excellence, the orchestral playing as good as before, the general artistic feeling, the enthusiasm, and (not least) the good-will are at the same high level as when I had the good fortune to become acquainted with your district, a district where you 'make music' yourselves first, and import it afterwards, thus happily reversing the procedure of places where they find it convenient to talk more and sing less.

He also expresses his pleasure in finding that a really noble piece of music, Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' found a place in the programme. In the unaccompanied competitive singing he notes a tendency to exaggerate the expression marks, and in view of the wide differences in the choice of tempi he suggests that the exact tempo should be indicated beforehand. He adds:—

During the Festival the time at the disposal of the adjudicators is so short that only the merest criticism is possible, and a great deal they would like to say is necessarily omitted. My sympathies are very frequently with the losing side, and, much as one would wish to enumerate good points, the exigencies of competition somewhat restrict adjudicators to a recital of the errors which debar competitors from the first place. I look forward, therefore, to the gathering to be held in Morecambe shortly, when I hope to meet all the conductors, successful and unsuccessful, whom I have only seen for a moment under the public eye and at the distance between the 'bad eminence' of the judges' box and the platform, and I hope to have the pleasure to make the personal acquaintance of these gentlemen to whom we owe so much artistic progress and pleasure, and to whom is due the main credit for the wonderful spread of music 'somewhere farther north.'

The meeting referred to was held on July 23, when more than seventy conductors attended. In the course of an address, which was highly appreciated, Sir Edward referred to his own early experiences as a conductor of amateurs. He pleaded for dignity and restraint in conducting, and urged his audience to aim more and more at culture and refinement. A discussion having arisen as to the advisability of encouraging male-voice choirs with alto as top part, he was inclined to the opinion that as nothing was now written for this class of voice, the employment of it must die out. One conductor had the temerity to say that his choir did not care for Brahms's part-songs, and had asked him to 'lose or burn the copies.' Sir Edward created considerable amusement by suggesting that the conductor had better by half 'lose or burn his choir!'

Mr. Henry J. Wood has instituted an Orchestral Society. In a manifesto-circular announcing this fact the well-known conductor says: 'The purpose of the Society is practical; its aim, to be an educative influence upon the musical career of the individuals who care to profit by it.' So far, so good; but when he says, 'that in England we have amongst our countrymen very few players fitted by training, or qualified by after experience, for places in a classical orchestra,' we feel that this is a reflection upon our Schools of Music and the splendid opportunities they afford for equipping orchestral players. One has only to attend the concerts of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music to bear testimony to the excellence of the orchestral playing of the students at those Institutions, and the same can be said of others up and down the country. However, a number of those who wish to gain experience in orchestral technique will doubtless be glad to avail themselves of the advantages Mr. Wood offers. Applications for membership of Mr. Henry J. Wood's Orchestral Society should be made to the Secretary, Mr. C. W. James, 10, Duke Street, St. James's.

His Majesty the King has recently conferred the honour of Knighthood upon three well-known and much respected amateurs of music—Professor James Dewar, the distinguished scientist and a Director of the Royal Academy of Music; Mr. George Donaldson, whose benefaction of ancient musical instruments to the Royal College of Music is worthily associated with his name; and Mr. Alfred S. Scott-Gatty, a composer of many charming songs, on his appointment to the ancient office of Garter Principal King-of-Arms.

In view of the approaching season of Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, Mr. Robert Newman sends us a long list of novelties—forty in number—to be performed under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, together with the names—upwards of one hundred—of those artists who, as solo singers and players on instruments, will co-operate in these welcome music-makings. The concerts, which will extend from August 6 to October 21, are sure to be well patronized by reason of their high aims and the keen enjoyment they afford to true lovers of music. The Earl Howe, G.C.V.O., Lord Chamberlain to Queen Alexandra, has joined the Board of 'The Queen's Hall Orchestra, Limited.'

The recently-formed London Symphony Orchestra gave their second concert on July 2 at Queen's Hall, the conductor on this occasion being Mr. Charles Williams. The principal orchestral works selected were the Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' and Brahms's Fourth Symphony; but interest was chiefly centred in the first appearance of Master Franz von Vecsey with orchestra. The result was somewhat disappointing. The lad seemed to be hampered in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, but he made ample amends in Paganini's Concerto, which was interpreted with extraordinary assurance and brilliancy for a child of eleven. Almost more wonderful by reason of the volume of tone and expression was the rendering of the familiar Air in G by Bach, given by way of an encore.

The Reliquary and Illustrated Archaeologist for July contains an exhaustive and illustrated article entitled 'Notes on a Roman Hydraulus,' by the Rev. F. W. Galpin, who has for a long time made a special study of that ancient instrument. Mr. Galpin delivered an interesting lecture on 'The Water Organ of the Ancients, and the Organ of To-day,' at the recent Loan Exhibition held under the auspices of the Musicians' Company, when he gave illustrations on a working model of a Roman hydraulus. —Occasional Papers, a monthly magazine published at 3, Lansdowne Crescent, Bournemouth, had an article in its June issue on the evergreen subject 'Is England a Musical Nation?' by Mr. Duncan Hume, and its July number includes a paper on 'The National Music of Great Britain,' by Mr. Arthur T. George. The magazine is well edited and its articles are brightly written.

An amalgamation has recently been effected of three well-known and old-established music schools—to wit: The London Academy of Music, founded in 1861; The London Music School, founded in 1865; and the Forest Gate College of Music, founded in 1885. On and after September 1st these united institutions will be known as The London Academy of Music, having its headquarters at 22, Princes Street, Oxford Circus, with branches at Kensington, Brighton, Forest Gate, Southend, and elsewhere. The direction of the enterprise—which is about to be legally incorporated—will be under a Board of Management, to consist of Dr. Yorke Trotter, Mr. A. Raimo, Signor L. Denza, Mr. W. Harding Bonner, and Mr. Frank Bonner.

The management of the St. Louis Exposition, in contracting with the Grenadier Guards Band to play there, stipulated that the bandmen must play at the low pitch. Thereupon Mr. A. Williams, the bandmaster, in order to comply with this requirement, instructed Messrs. Boosey and Co. to manufacture a complete set of instruments at the low pitch. The band, consisting of sixty musicians, will use their new instruments at the daily performances given by them at Earl's Court Exhibition. This will be the first opportunity afforded to musicians of hearing an English Regimental Band playing at the low pitch; a fact which cannot fail to be one of interest and, indeed, of satisfaction.

Answers to Correspondents.

VILLAGE ORGANIST.—The word shawm is a corruption of chalumeau, signifying a primitive clarinet or oboe. It is incorrectly used in the Prayer-book version of Psalm xcvi., v. 7, 'With trumpets also and shawms,' as the literal translation is 'With khatsostrah and sound of shophar make a joyful noise before the Lord the King.' In the Septuagint the passage reads (translated):—'With ductile trumpets, and the sound of horn-trumpets'; so too in the Vulgate—'In tubis ductilibus et voce tubæ cornæ.' The use of the word 'cornet' in the Authorised Version (the sixth, not seventh verse of Psalm xcvi.) is rather unfortunate as giving a somewhat vulgar idea of a noble and consecrated instrument. The khatsostrah is considered to have been a straight trumpet, with a bell; the shophar, a rousing-toned trumpet mentioned three times in the Psalms (Ps. xlvii., v. 5; lxxxi., v. 3; cl., v. 3), and frequently elsewhere in the Old Testament. The shophar, as Sir John Stainer says ('The Music of the Bible'), 'is especially interesting to us as being the only Hebrew instrument whose use on certain solemn occasions seems to be retained to this day.'

CHOIRMASTER.—There is always a certain amount of risk in stating who was the first to do this or that; but in regard to the earliest instance of the pointing of Bible Psalms (the Authorised Version) we believe it can be claimed for the late Mr. Andrew Deakin, of Birmingham. In 1846 he issued a little book entitled 'Euphonia: portions of Holy Scripture, marked for chanting, with twenty-five of the most approved chants.' Although 'Euphonia' appeared anonymously, Mr. Deakin was both the editor and printer of the book. In 1847 the late Dr. Gauntlett issued his 'Bible Psalms,' and in the same year the late John Curwen published 'Psalms arranged in proper rhythm for chanting.'

R. B. N.—(1) So far as we can discover the following are the production dates of the Tchaikovsky operas you name:—'Snegourochka' ('The Snow Queen'), May 11, 1873; 'Oprichnik,' at St. Petersburg, 1874; 'The Swan Lake' (a lyric drama), 1876; 'Vakoula, the Smith,' at St. Petersburg, November, 1876; 'Eugene Oniegin,' at St. Petersburg (as 'Jevgenjie Onégin'), 1879; 'Joan of Arc' (or 'Maid of Orleans'), 1881; 'Mazeppa,' 1884; 'Pikowaya Dama' ('Pique-Dame'), 1890; 'Iolanta,' 1893. There is more than one variant in the spelling of the foregoing titles, as there is of the composer's name. (2) Moszkowsky's opera 'Boabdil' was first performed at Berlin, on April 21, 1892.

H. G.—(1) The Prize Tune 'Lothbury,' about which you write, originally appeared in The Musical Standard of December 3, 1864. It was composed by Mr. Henry J. South, now of Richmond, Surrey, to whom any enquiry concerning the tune should be addressed. (2) Handel's 'Harmonious Blacksmith' is a myth, so far as regards its title. We have not space to tell the whole story, but you will find it clearly set forth in Dr. Cummings's little biography of the master (p. 62) published by Messrs. George Bell and Sons. The familiar air and its variations, first published in 1720, is hardly suitable for an organ voluntary in church.

DULCIANA.—Mr. Arthur G. Hill's 'Organ Cases and Organs of the Middle Ages and Renaissance' contains drawings of the following English organ cases: In vol. i.—Westminster Abbey (an organ specially erected for the Coronation of William and Mary in 1677); Gloucester Cathedral; King's College, Cambridge; Exeter Cathedral. In vol. ii.—Stanford Church, near Rugby; Tewkesbury Abbey; the Church of St. Catherine Cree, Leadenhall Street, London; Eton College Chapel (former organ); and Finedon Church, Northamptonshire.

THELMA.—The following will serve for 'some classical but lively duets for the pianoforte, not very hard to play': Beethoven—Sonata in D (Op. 6) and Three Marches (Op. 45); Mozart—Sonatas in D, B flat, and C; Hummel—Sonatas in E flat and A flat, Nocturne in F; Schubert—Marches, Rondos, Variations, Divertissements Hongroise, and Polonaises; Schumann—Bilder aus Osten and Ballscenen; Weber—Twenty Pieces. All original pianoforte duets, not arrangements.

S. P. D.—The difficulty you experience of getting to know of new songs might be overcome by subscribing to a Musical Circulating Library.

J. P.—(1) A suggested reasonable (or judicious) speed for the performance of the 'Zauberflöte' Overture might by some be considered unreasonable. The magic of Mozart's music is enhanced by its impetuous velocity, provided the players are equal to the demands thus made upon them. (2) Spronato (in F. von Suppé's Overture 'Ein Morgen, ein Mittag, ein Abend in Wien') means 'spur on,' or 'no flagging.' (3) Messrs. Novello (Foreign department) will supply you with full information concerning the works of Brahms.

FLUSHING.—Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' is not usually curtailed in performance; but perhaps the selection sung annually at St. Paul's Cathedral may answer the purpose of your inquiry—Nos. 14 to 22, The Conversion of St. Paul; No. 24 to 26, The Preaching of the Apostle; and Nos. 39 to the end, the Persecution and Martyrdom.

S. F. S.—We regret to be unable to give you the address you desire. The best known emporiums whereat to purchase second-hand music are Mr. W. Reeves, 83, Charing Cross Road; Messrs. H. White and Son, 2, Great Turnstile, Holborn; and Mr. Maurice Middleton, Dr. Johnson Passage, Bull Street, Birmingham.

D. S.—There are biographies of Clementi and Dussek (in French) and of Raff (in German). These can be obtained through Messrs. Novello. We do not know of a Life of Hummel; see the notices of him in the various biographical dictionaries.

SWELL-BOX.—There is no fee demanded for the performance of M. Guilmant's organ compositions in public; but you might be called upon to pay a small sum for the privilege of playing the works of MM. Dubois, Saint-Saëns, and Widor in public buildings other than churches.

AMBITIOUS.—The words (by Matthew Arnold) are doubtless copyright; if so, you would first have to obtain permission to print them.

PARLIAMENT HILL.—The following musicians are buried in Highgate Cemetery: W. H. Weiss, Dr. E. F. Rimbault, Dr. E. T. Chipp, George Alexander Osborne, Carl Rosa and his wife, Madame Parepa Rosa.

MUSICUS.—We are strongly of opinion that a congregation is much better led if the choir is placed in front of the worshippers, and not located in the west gallery behind them. There is a consensus of opinion in support of this view.

W. H. S.—The 'Schule des höheren Clavierspiels Technische Studien bis zur höchsten Ausbildung' of Moriz Rosenthal and Ludwig Schytte is furnished with an English translation of the text.

CHOIRMASTER.—See Mr. Myles B. Foster's 'Anthems and Anthem Composers,' a book which gives much information on the subject in which you are interested.

W. W. H.—Verdi's 'Requiem' is published by Messrs. Ricordi and Co., price four shillings (vocal score).

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY
ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventual episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM,

A NEW HARVEST CANTATA By DR. FERRIS TOZER.

. We most strongly recommend this Cantata to all in search of a good and popular work for a Harvest Festival. The libretto (by the late Rev. SAMUEL BARBER) is founded on a most interesting analogy which is well conceived and well carried out, and we venture to say that there is not one dull page in the music, from the solemn opening "The earth was without form and void" to the triumphant and inspiring conclusion "And He shall reign for ever and ever."

A Specimen Copy will be sent to any Clergyman or Choirmaster (giving name of church) for six stamps.

OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC

EDITED BY
JOHN E. WEST.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The Organ Music of the older English composers has for some years been much neglected, owing chiefly to its slight texture and the antiquated character of its registering, which make a literal performance of it unsuited to organs of the present day.

Some of it, however, is too good to be allowed to fall into oblivion. The character of its general outline is in no way destroyed by a judicious modification of details to suit modern requirements.

Probably some of the "filling in" which the thinness of certain passages now seems to demand was actually intended in performance.

The object of the present series is to provide a selection of the best of these pieces, adapted only so far as necessary to make them practicable and effective on modern organs.

PREFACE.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason, the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern, so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The lack of certain well-known hymns in that book and the need of extra hymns for certain occasions are often felt. This is clear from the fact that many supplemental appendixes and leaflets are now used with it, particularly books for mission services, children's use, and other special occasions.

It may be said by many that we already have too many hymns, and that a large number are most unsuitable. There is no subject upon which persons differ more thoroughly than the suitability of different hymns. No two people will ever agree as to all the hymns in any collection. The only way of dealing satisfactorily with this problem seems to be to give a comprehensive compilation, together with guidance as to the character of each hymn. Hence, in the index of first lines a letter has been prefixed to each hymn giving an indication as to its characteristic—whether a hymn of direct praise, a prayer, or sentimental, historical, etc., etc. Those who object to hymns of any particular class can, therefore, easily avoid their use.

Guided by these two principles, hymns have been included for the following reasons:—

1. Hymns which, being in constant request, are inserted, not necessarily because of their merit, but rather because they have been found to be of real use in many cases.

2. Since the formation of other hymn books, much greater prominence has been given to music in connection with Choral Celebrations, and with this has grown a want of more hymns, especially short ones of one or two verses for different parts of the service.

3. So also has there grown a demand for further hymns on Almshousing, for Processionals of a greater length than usual, for Harvest, Flower, and Mission Services, besides other special occasions.

4. Finally, it is felt by very many to be a mistake to accustom children to the use of a Children's hymn book which will be discarded when they have grown older. Far better is it to accustom them at once, when young, to love the hymn book which they will use in after life. For this purpose a few more children's hymns than are supplied in other books seem to be wanted.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"The object of the present analysis is to place in the hands of students a detailed and exhaustive scheme of every Prelude and Fugue. In the Preludes the mode of procedure has been: (1) To give the Figure upon which each Prelude is built; (2) to give the Prelude itself in full and copiously marked, or in a reduced form showing the structure; (3) a 'Summary' of the piece; and lastly, general 'Remarks' upon the structure and treatment of the materials. For the Fugues a Tabulated Analysis—bar by bar—is first given, then a 'Summary'
and 'Remarks' as before."

THE GRAMOPHONE

MADAME MELBA writes:

30, Great Cumberland Place, W.

To the Manager,

The Gramophone and Typewriter Co., Ltd., 21, City Rd., E.C.
Dear Sir,—I have tried the records and find them really wonderful reproductions of my singing. I feel that in them all the care and trouble to which your experts went last month has found great reward. My friends who heard them are simply delighted with them.

Yours faithfully, NELLIE MELBA.

MADAME ADELINA PATTI writes:

Craig-y-Nos Castle, Ystradgynlais, R.S.O., Breconshire, South Wales.

To the Gramophone Co., City Road, London.

Gentlemen,—I have much pleasure in stating that I have heard your Monarch Gramophone, and that I consider it a very remarkable instrument of its kind, and quite the most perfect that I have ever heard. It reproduces the human voice to such a fine point that in listening to the records of Caruso, Plançon, &c., it seemed to me as if those artists were actually singing in my saloons. I have never heard anything to equal it.

Yours truly, ADELINA PATTI (BARONESS CEDERSTROM).

MR. EDWARD LLOYD writes:

Skippers Hill, Five Ashes, Sussex.
March 3rd, 1904.

The Gramophone Co., Ltd.

I must confess to you I had no idea the Gramophone was such a scientific and musical instrument, nor that such strides had been made in the science of sound reproduction. I had hitherto refused to have a record made of my voice, believing the result would be inartistic. I am, however, absolutely satisfied with the records, and am content that future generations shall judge my voice by the Gramophone.

I am, yours faithfully, EDWARD LLOYD.

JEAN DE RESZKE says:

I consider the Gramophone a truly marvellous instrument, and one which reproduces the human voice to perfection.

MADAME SARAH BERNHARDT says:

I thought I was listening, not to the echo of the voice of Calvé, but Calvé herself—the marvellous and only Calvé, etc., etc.

GENTLEMEN'S CONCERTS (ORCHESTRAL), MANCHESTER, FEBRUARY 29, 1904.

(Conductor: Dr. HANS RICHTER.)

Manchester Guardian says:

"The 'Couplets du Mysoli'—best of all the duet pieces for soprano voice and flute—were delightfully sung by Miss Lillie Wormald, who, as a light and agile soprano, has scarcely any rival among English singers of the present day. . . . In the two extremely delicate selections from Mozart Miss Wormald was also completely successful, and was very warmly applauded."

Manchester Courier says:

"Miss Lillie Wormald still retains her attractive style, and her voice has of late gained in volume and flexibility."

Manchester Evening News says:

"Miss Lillie Wormald sang two arias by Mozart, one from the 'Magic Flute,' and the other, 'Deh vieni, non tardar,' from the 'Marriage of Figaro.' They were well chosen to display the voice and style of the singer, who seems to be going from strength to strength in her profession."

Manchester Daily Dispatch says:

"Miss Lillie Wormald was the vocalist, and sang with excellent taste and sympathetic expression."

(Westminster Abbey.)

Mr. HENRY J. WOOD (Conductor, Queen's Hall Concerts) writes:—

"1, Langham Place, W., Feb. 14, 1901.

"Mr. Montague Borwell is an excellent vocalist.

"He has been most successful both at Queen's Hall, and at my Nottingham and Wolverhampton Concerts, in most difficult and trying roles, and I consider him one of the most reliable and painstaking baritone vocalists now before the public.

"HENRY J. WOOD."

"ELIJAH" (COLERAINE).—"His Elijah is a fine performance. Not a point was missing. There are supreme traditions of this part, and it can only be said that Mr. Borwell fully rivalled the best."—Belfast Evening Telegraph, March 10, 1904."ELIJAH" (WESLEYAN CHOIRS FESTIVAL).—"Mr. Montague Borwell as the Prophet was admirably suited to the part. He has a fine voice—very musical, and with an unusual degree of dramatic force."—Holloway and Hornsey Gazette, Nov. 6, 1903."ELIJAH" (BRIGHTON).—"Mr. Montague Borwell merits unstinted praise for the masterly manner in which he gave the solos allotted to Elijah. He was grandly effective in his recitatives, and aroused great enthusiasm by his superb renderings of the airs 'Lord God of Abraham' and 'It is enough.'"—Sussex Daily News, March 18, 1904."ELIJAH" (CLAPTON).—"The vivid portrayal of the great Prophet's work was grandly rendered by Mr. Montague Borwell."—Recorder, April 15, 1904."ELIJAH" (BROMLEY).—"The title-part was splendidly interpreted by Mr. Montague Borwell. He possesses a magnificent voice, and as Elijah sang with rare dramatic power."—Sunderland Daily Post, April 21, 1904."ACIS AND GALATEA" (SITTINGBOURNE).—"Real enthusiasm was not, however, aroused until Mr. Montague Borwell made his appearance on the scene. In 'O ruddier than the cherry' he made the great 'hit' of the evening. He was in splendid voice, and the familiar air was superbly rendered. The runs were taken with consummate ease, and when Mr. Borwell finished with a double octave, the 'house' fairly rose at him: such a storm of enthusiasm being aroused as we have not seen in Sittingbourne for years."—East Kent Gazette, May 14, 1904."HIAWATHA" (DORKING).—"The intensity of the distressed man's cry was sung by Mr. Montague Borwell with a declamatory poignancy most touching to listen to, and made a deep impression on the hearers."—Dorking Advertiser, April 30, 1904.

Her best effort, to our mind, was the air 'Hear ye, Israel.'"—Recorder, April 15, 1904."FAUST" (GOUNOD).—(GOLDSMITHS' INSTITUTE).—"In the character of Margarita Miss Winifred Marwood was all that could be desired, and gave the difficult 'Jewel' song excellently. She was also very good in the 'Prison' scene terminating with the brilliant trio for Margarita, Faust, and Mephistopheles."—Journal, March, 1904."ELIJAH" (SUNDERLAND).—"Miss Winifred Marwood was in fine voice, and her share of the work was excellently performed; particularly was this so in the duet 'What have I to do with thee.'"—Daily Post, April 21, 1904."CREATION" (CLYDEBANK).—"Miss Winifred Marwood sang all her solos with fervour and charm. She has a cultured voice, fresh and resonant, and a good concert-platform style. At the close of the air 'With verdure clad' she had to repeatedly bow her acknowledgments to the enthusiastic applause of the audience."—Clydebank Press."MESSIAH" (BOSTON).—"Miss Winifred Marwood possesses a pure soprano voice, most flexible and clear, which was shown to great advantage in the florid style of some of her airs, her voice being flute-like in the trills and beautiful throughout."—Boston Independent.HANDEL'S "L'ALLEGRO" (BRIGHTON).—"To a large extent the gratification yielded by the performance came from the singing of Miss Winifred Marwood. Not often does the Society get a singer so thoroughly suited to her work. SEPTEMBER 1, 1904.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

It is fifty-four years since the Great Northern Railway was opened, the actual date being August 7, 1850. Those who made the earliest journeys started from Maiden Lane, boarding the train from a temporary platform on the banks of Regent's Canal, as King's Cross Station was not opened till two years later. Bradshaw of that time shows only one third-class (Parly.) train each day! This started at the matutinal hour of seven, and, stopping at every station, occupied three and a-half hours on its leisurely journey to Peterborough, a distance of seventy-six miles. But for the opposition of certain obtuse landowners, the railway would have kept its course near the Great North Road and passed through Stamford, leaving the Cathedral of which we write to be reached by cross-country routes: in that case Peterborough might have remained a more or less somnolent city instead of becoming the important railway centre it is to-day.

Ages ago Peterborough bore the pretty name of Medeshamstede—the homestead in the meadows. Its subsequent great wealth, or else the gilded nature of its monastery roofs, caused the city to be re-christened Gildenburgh, or Golden Borough, a designation which ultimately gave place to Peter's Borough, or Peterborough. On the way from the railway station to the Cathedral the visitor will notice the ancient church of St. John the Baptist, built early in the fifteenth century. Almost adjoining the sacred edifice is the Guild Hall, a quaint old building dated 1671. If it should be Market Day—say a sunshiny Saturday in July, as on the occasion of our visit—one cannot fail to be struck with the animated and picturesque scene in the adjacent Market Place. Much business is done in those canvas booth erections in the open air. The varied comestibles so daintily set out for show (and purchase) look very tempting, and the display of salmon would do credit to a Bond Street shop. The subjoined illustration shows this old-world scene in all its native simplicity.

A few steps and we are at the entrance gate to the Minster precincts. This portal, built by Abbot Benedict late in the twelfth century, well focuses the feature of Peterborough Cathedral—its glorious West Front. No wonder that Professor Freeman said: 'The portico of Peterborough is unique; the noblest conception of the old Greek translated into the speech of Christendom and of England has no fellow before it or after it.' Curiously enough nothing is known as to the designer or builder of this magnificent West Front. It seems to have been an afterthought, as it was added after the main building had been completed—the approximate date of the Nave being 1190, and of the West Front 1235. Although one can form a good idea of its stately beauty from a photograph, a visit must be paid to Peterborough in order to fully realize the charm and significance of this noble façade. As Mr. Sweeting, in his excellent book on Peterborough in Bell's Cathedral Series, says: 'It is rather a porch, or piazza, than a front; for it consists of a paved walk of some extent outside the wall of the Cathedral, covered at a great height by a vaulted roof which is supported by the wall and by the three great arches.' The style is of the best and purest Early English.

ANCIENT GATEWAY TO THE CATHEDRAL.
(Photographed specially for this article by Mr. A. C. Taylor, Peterborough.)

The porch or parvise, erected beneath the middle arch, was inserted as a support to the two great piers. Here is located the Cathedral Library, containing an interesting relic of the old Benedictine Library, the manuscript known as The Book of Swapham. A memorandum written therein states that, in 1642, fearful of impending troubles, Precentor Humphrey Austin hid the precious tome. Cromwell's soldiers however found the book and would probably have confiscated it, but the Precentor, under pretence of inquiring after an old Latin Bible, discovered the whereabouts of the Swapham MS. and redeemed it for the sum of ten shillings! A fine pillar at the western doorway of the Cathedral attracts attention by reason of its well-carved base containing one of those conceits dear to the mediæval mind. It represents a Benedictine tortured by demons, a significant hint to the monks that a sacred calling demanded a consistent life.

Before entering the Cathedral we may briefly refer to its history. The present church is the third built on this spot: a monastery founded at Peterborough in the year 655, and one of the earliest seats of Christianity in central England, was the first. The foundations of that initial church must have been very substantial, as they were laid with 'such stones as that eight yoke of oxen could scarce draw one of them.' This monastery was destroyed by the Danes in 879, and desolation reigned supreme for the next hundred years. Portions of the foundations of this early Saxon church are still to be seen. In 970 Æthelwold, Bishop of Winchester, aided by King Edgar, built a church and monastery with which is associated the story of Hereward, the Saxon patriot, as set forth by Charles Kingsley in his Hereward the Wake. The Danes again took a fancy to the buildings, but spared them from destruction. Another enemy, fire, accidentally destroyed this, the second monastery, in 1116. Thereupon, in 1117, John of Sais began to erect the present noble Norman building. The Choir was finished in 1143, the Transepts about seven years later, and the Nave about the year 1190. The Western Transept and the West Front completed the building about 1235, thus—exclusive of the easternmost New Building, circa 1500—the stately fane has stood for nearly 600 years.

Without affirming that architecture is frozen music, no one upon entering this Cathedral can fail to be impressed with its harmony, though the pointed great arch under the central tower may give just a semblance of discord to the Norman architectonic concords of this majestic interior. The Norman Nave ceiling is both curious and remarkable in the way of quaint decoration. Upon looking up thereat some strange devices meet the eye. It is natural enough to find St. Peter with the keys, and kings, queens and minstrels in a sacred edifice; but here the grotesque, as it invariably did, has entered into the designs of those funny old-time artists. Such humoresques are exemplified by a head with two faces, a monkey riding backwards on a goat, a human figure having the head and hoofs of a donkey, a horse so musically constituted that the animal is playing a harp, while a lion is in the act of performing certain terpsichorean gyrations. As the building of the Cathedral proceeded westward a change of plan caused two bays to be added to the Nave; another afterthought brought into existence the Western transept (surmounted by the Bell tower), and, happiest afterthought of all, the portico, or West Front, the crowning feature of the Minster, to adopt its ancient designation.

Strength and beauty in this sanctuary are manifested in the Norman apse—a rare feature, one of the best in England, and slightly earlier than that at Norwich—and the New Building, situated at the easternmost end of the Cathedral. The New Building, a very fine example of late Perpendicular work, is of the width of the Choir and aisles together, and is deftly joined on to the main structure. In the beautiful fan tracery of the roof one is reminded of King's College, Cambridge (see the illustration below). The Cathedral suffered terrible damage during the Civil War, when the Parliamentary troops literally ransacked the church and unmercifully wrought irreparable damage. Alas! this is not the only misfortune that has befallen Peterborough's pride.

THE NEW BUILDING.

(Photographed specially for this article by Mr. A. C. Taylor, Peterborough.)

No cathedral has been more restored on account of its bad building and the nature of the subsoil. The Central tower had to be entirely taken down in 1883 and rebuilt, and in 1896 the West Front underwent similar treatment. The immense sum of £80,000 has been expended on these necessary safeguards to the stability of the building, and it is to be feared that the Dean and Chapter have not seen the last of this necessary expenditure for maintaining the fabric committed to their charge. But these great and unavoidable outlays have always been generously met, English people being proud of their Cathedrals, and regarding them as a precious heritage of national interest and importance.

Mr. Taylor's excellent photographs so admirably portray the architectural characteristics of the building that we may now turn to other matters of interest. Two queens have been buried within the Minster walls—Catharine of Arragon, the first of the sextet of ladies espoused by King Henry VIII., and Mary Queen of Scots. Catharine of Arragon died at Kimbolton Castle, Huntingdonshire, on January 7, 1536, and was buried on the north side of the Choir. The official Instructions concerning the interment of the unfortunate lady commence thus :—

First the Corps must be sered, tranayled, leded, and chested with spices and other things thereunto appertayning.

The ill-fated Mary Queen of Scots was executed at Fotheringay Castle, nine miles south-west of Peterborough, on February 8, 1587. Nearly six months elapsed however before her remains were buried, the place of sepulture being the south side of the Choir of the Cathedral. Under the direction of Garter King of Arms the solemn procession left the castle in the stillness of night, made still more weird by flaming torches. Upon the arrival of the corpse at two o'clock on Sunday morning, July 30, the coffin was at once deposited in the vault prepared for it 'because it was so extreame heavy by reason of the lead, that the gentlemen could not endure to have carried it with leisure in the solemn proceeding; and besides, was feared, that the sowder might ripp, and being very hot weather, might be found some annoyance.' On the following Tuesday—to quote still further from a contemporary record—'at the church doore the singing men and Quiristers met the mourners with a Psalme, and led them the way into the Chancell, continuïng singing with the Organs untill the sermon began.' This discourse was preached by the Bishop of Lincoln, 'after which certain anthems were sung by the quire . . . and so every one departed, as they came, after their degrees, to the Bishop's palace, where was prepared a most royal feast, and a dole given unto the poore.' After having reposed at Peterborough for twenty-five years the remains of the beheaded queen were removed to Westminster, at dead of night on October 11, 1612, and re-interred in a capacious vault in Henry VII.'s Chapel under a sumptuous altar-tomb erected by James I.

The sexton who dug the graves for both the queens above mentioned, although their deaths were separated by a period of fifty-one years, was Robert Scarlett (1499?—1594), a well-known figure in the precincts of Peterborough Cathedral during the greater part of the sixteenth century. Old Scarlett, as he was called, who died at the age of 98, is commemorated in the Cathedral by his portrait suspended from the Western wall. The original, painted in 1665, cost £1 12s., but the present picture is a copy, of which we give a photograph. The nonagenarian sexton is portrayed arrayed in a red suit, as matching his patronymic, with his pickaxe, spade, and keys, and with a skull, as an emblem of his calling, at his feet. The dog whip thrust through his leathern girdle formed an integral part of a sexton's equipment in those days, for the purpose of whipping dogs out of church.

Beneath the portrait, which contains the arms of the Cathedral, are the following quaint lines:—

YOV SEE OLD SCARLEITS PICTVRE STAND ON HIE
BVT AT YOVR FEETE THERE DOTHS HIS BODY LYE
HIS GRAVESTONE DOTHS HIS AGE AND DEATH TIME SHOW HIS OFFICE BY THEIS TOKENS YOV MAY KNOW
SECOND TO NONE FOR STRENGTH AND STVRDYE LIMM
A SCARBABE MIGHTY VOICE WITH VISAGE GRIM
HEE HAD INTERD TWO QUEENES WITHIN THIS PLACE AND THIS TOWNES HOVSEHOLDERS IN HIS LIVES SPACE TWICE OVER: BVT AT LENGTH HIS OWN TYRNE CAME WHAT HEE FOR OTHERS DID FOR HIM THE SAME WAS DONE: NO DOVBT HIS SOVLE DOTHS LIVE FOR AYE
IN HEAVEN: THOUGH HERE HIS BODY CLAD IN CLAY

The ruddy hue of Old Scarlett's outer habiliment recalls a story that afforded great delight to Mendelssohn during one of his visits to England. A country sexton officiated at a funeral clad in a red waistcoat. At the conclusion of the obsequies the vicar gently remonstrated with the old gravedigger, saying: 'Robert, you should not wear a red waistcoat at a funeral; you hurt the feelings of the mourners.' Robert replied, placing his hand on his breast: 'Well, what does it matter, sir, so long as the heart is black'!

Peterborough can claim connection with some famous men. Paley, of Christian Evidences fame, was a native, being the son of a minor canon of the Cathedral. Among the bishops have been Magee (afterwards Archbishop of York), and Creighton (afterwards Bishop of London); while Dean Perowne is remembered by his Commentary on the Psalms, a masterpiece of exegetical science, and the name of Bishop Westcott, a former Canon of Peterborough and author of the Paragraph Psalter, is held in reverent memory.

A STUDY IN PERSPECTIVE.

Compared with most other cathedrals, Peterborough has very few stained windows. The last that has been inserted is an interesting one, as it is a memorial to the Rev. Henry Twells (1823-1900), an honorary Canon of the Cathedral and the author of one of the most beautiful of evening hymns, 'At even, ere the sun was set.' This favourite hymn first appeared in the 'Appendix to Hymns Ancient and Modern' (1868), for which,

THE NAVE, LOOKING EAST.

(Photographed specially for this article by Mr. A. C. Taylor, Peterborough.)

by special request, it was written. According to the Rev. Dr. Julian, 'it has been included in almost every collection published from that date [1868] both in Great Britain and America.' Writing on November 21, 1898, Canon Twells himself said concerning his far-famed lyric: 'I have been asked for permission to insert it in 157 hymnals, all over the English-speaking world, and connected, of course, with very different denominations of Christians. Many more hymnals have taken it without leave, of which I do not complain, except when they have altered it after their own fashion.'

The information concerning the various organs in Peterborough Cathedral is unfortunately rather meagre. According to Gunton, the seventeenth century historian of the Cathedral, there were (temp. 1550) 'two pair of organs in the Quire, and a pair of Organs in the Ladies Chappell.' The Roundheads played havoc with the organs, as they did with other portions of the sacred edifice. At a Chapter Meeting held on September 29, 1680, it was ordered :—

That whereas the organ belonging to this church is judged too small and imperfect, there shall be a new one made according to the proposals made by Mr. Thamer, now in the Dean's hands, as we shall hereafter agree with him upon the particular articles.

The sum agreed upon was £115, towards which amount the Dean contributed £15, and each Prebendary £7 10s. Thomas Thamer, of London (generally referred to as living and working at Peterborough), contracted with the Dean and Chapter to make the new organ. In 1713 the instrument was found to be in disorder. According to the Chapter records :—

Mr. Henry Price, organ maker, stated that it was choked up with dirt and out of repair, and the trumpet-stop had become useless with some hundreds of pipes out of tune and not fit to be played on. Mr. Price was to have £15 to put the Organ into tune and right order and to amend all the defects, and from this time he was to have a yearly allowance of £3 to keep the organ in good order and to repair all defects and decays for seven years to come.

During the period when Francis Lockier was Dean (1725-40), there is a reference in the Chapter books to some measures being taken for the erection of a new organ by a builder named Kellinburgh, but nothing seems to have come of the proposal. If these old records do nothing else, they give us the names of some unknown organ-makers, as they were called in past times. In 1809, William Allen, of London, built a new organ of some twenty-four sounding stops, therefore, with Lincoln, two cathedral organs came from his factory. This instrument was added to by Holdich in 1848, and again by Hill in 1871. It had a double keyboard—one on the Choir side for ordinary services, and another on the South side for Nave services.

Until the year 1883, the organ at Peterborough stood on a screen: this position is shown in the accompanying illustration. At the restoration of the Cathedral, under the direction of the late Mr. J. L. Pearson, R.A., the organ screen was removed and the choir stalls were extended westwards beyond the central tower, the return stalls being placed at the second bay of the Nave. A new four-manual organ, the gift of an anonymous donor, was built by Messrs. W. Hill and Son, at a cost of £4,400. This fine instrument, of which a complete specification will be found subjoined, is located thus: the pedal (excepting two stops, Bourdon and Bass flute), great, solo, and swell organs, are placed in four bays of the Triforium on

The choristers of Peterborough, sixteen in number, are town boys who receive their general education at the Grammar School. Of former choristers who have done well in after-life, mention should be made of the Rev. G. Trundle, a remarkable solo boy, who proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge, and is now a Minor Canon in York

Minster. The Rev. G. M. Livett, now Vicar of Wateringbury, Kent,—one of Dr. Keeton's first alto boys and a very good one—was a Minor Canon in and Precentor of Rochester Cathedral before he obtained his present preferment; in addition to Mr. Haydon Hare, organist of St. Nicholas Church, Great Yarmouth, Mr. R. T. Back, organist of Grantham Parish Church, and the late Mr. Arthur Carnall, all of whom were choristers at Peterborough. There are no alto lay-clerks now on the Foundation: for the past twenty-five years the alto part has been sung by boys.

It is not surprising that the chanting of the Psalms receives special attention at Peterborough, as in 1879 the late Bishop Westcott, then a Canon of the Cathedral, issued his Paragraph Psalter, in the arrangement of which he received valuable help from Dr. Keeton. No pains are spared in the endeavour to bring out the matchless beauties and endless potentialities of the Psalms, and yet the means used are commendably simple and natural. Take, for example, Psalm 24, which is thus divided by Westcott:—

- Verses 1 and 2. The Sovereignty of the Lord.
- " 3 to 6. His true worshippers.
- " 7 to 10. His welcome to His sanctuary.

This magnificent Psalm is chanted in the following illuminating manner :—

Verses 1 and 2	...	...	Full.
Verse 3	...	...	Men unison.
„ 4	...	...	Boys unison.
Verses 5 and 6	...	...	Full.

The organ also lends its artistic and devotional aid in amplifying the poetic import of these Biblical treasures, as, for example, after verse 6 of Psalm 137 (By the waters of Babylon), when a pathetic interlude is played by Dr. Keeton with reverent taste and perfect appropriateness.

The first name on the roll of organists of Peterborough is that of Richard Storey (1541), who held the office at the time of the monastery, and who continued to hold it (and that of master of the choristers) at the time of the Reformation: his salary was £10 per annum. The names of Richard Tiller and John Mudd—the latter possibly an ancestor of the celebrated Mr. Mudd, organist of Lincoln Cathedral—next appear on the roll. Mudd received a salary of £10 as organist and one of £6 13s. 4d. as Epistoler, and in 1629 he was awarded £4 as ‘benevolence money.’ There are a Morning and Evening Service (in D minor) and four anthems (including a setting of ‘We beseech Thee’) at Ely Cathedral by one of the Mudd family, and the same name is to be found among the music MSS. at the British Museum,—some Fancies and an In Nomine—in addition to two anthems at Peterhouse, Cambridge. None of these Mudd compositions appear to have been printed.

At the beginning of the reigns of three successive organists named Standish—David, William, and Roger—the salary was £20; but in 1691 Roger Standish was allowed £8 for pricking eight new books and filling up eight old ones. There is a memorial inscription in the Cathedral to one James Hawkins, who died October 5, 1750, aged 56, after having held the organistship for thirty-seven years. We may pass on to John Calah, organist from 1785 to 1798, the composer of a once popular double-chant, and make mention of Edmund Larkin, chief musician from 1812 to 1837, who, in addition to his salary of £63 per annum, received a payment of £6 ‘for tuning the pipes of the organ and keeping in tune the harpsichord in the music-room.’ There is a mural memorial to John Speechly, organist from 1837 to 1869, the immediate predecessor of Dr. Keeton. Several of the organists are buried in the Minster, and the New Building contains the remains of John Brimble, a youthful organist of St. John’s College, Cambridge, who died July 25, 1670, aged 18. A memorial inscription to him reads—

Musis et musicæ devotissimus Ad cælestem evectus Academiam.

Dr. Haydn Keeton, the present organist and master of the choristers of Peterborough Cathedral, has held that dual office with distinction since 1870, a period of thirty-four years. The son of the late Mr. Edwin Keeton,—organist of Eckington Parish Church for forty-nine years—he was born at Mosborough, near Chesterfield, on October 26, 1847. He became a chorister of St. George’s Chapel, Windsor, and a pupil of Sir George Elvey. While residing in the Royal borough he made the acquaintance of Sir Hubert Parry, then an Eton Boy. The future director of the Royal College of Music entrusted Elvey’s pupil with the copying of his (Parry’s) exercise for the degree of Mus. B., the fee for so doing being a welcome addition to Master Keeton’s somewhat slender finances. In 1867 Dr. Keeton was appointed organist of Datchet Church, and during the period of his articles he led a busy life as a teacher in Windsor and its neighbourhood. In 1869 the Rev. J. Hawtrey offered him the appointment of organist and music-master at his preparatory school at Aldin House, Slough: this post he held for six months. At the age of twenty-two he obtained the appointment of organist of Peterborough Cathedral. He took the degree of Mus. B. (Oxon.) in 1869, and that of Mus. D. in 1877: he has examined for the Universities of Oxford and Durham, and also for the Royal College of Organists.

Dr. Keeton has conducted the Peterborough Musical Festivals, and is conductor of the Peterborough Choral Union. As a composer there can be placed to his credit a Symphony, anthems and other church music, pianoforte pieces, songs, &c. He is also favourably known as the author of

The Church and Cathedral Choristers' Singing Method. Dr. Keeton has not only worthily upheld all the best traditions of English cathedral music during his long reign at Peterborough, but he can point to a large number of former pupils who are carrying on the traditions of his thoroughness and artistic ideals in various places, and who bear strong testimony to the esteem in which he is held as a teacher, a musician, and a friend.

For kind help rendered in the preparation of the foregoing chit-chat, the writer desires to thank Mr. William Fickling, B.A., St. Peter's College, Peterborough; Mr. A. C. Taylor, Secretary of the Infirmary, Peterborough, for the use of his excellent photographs, some of which he has kindly taken specially for this article; and Dr. Haydn Keeton, Organist and Master of the Choristers.

BAR-LINES.

By DR. WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, F.S.A.

The history of the use and introduction of these indispensable adjuncts to the accurate display of visible music, written or printed, has not hitherto received as much attention as the importance of the subject demands. Turning to Grove's Dictionary of Music we find the statement that 'the object of the bar appears to have been in the first place to facilitate the reading of compositions written in score, by keeping the different parts properly under each other, rather than to mark the rhythmic divisions. One of the earliest instances of the use of the bar is found in Agricola's "Musica Instrumentalis," 1529, in which the examples are written on a single staff of ten lines, the various parts being placed above each other in the same staff; the introduction of the bar into separate voice-parts is of much later date. The works of Tallis, Bird, and Gibbons were all published without them.' This is very erroneous and misleading. Agricola's book was published in 1528; it is now lying before me, and I find in addition to the ten-line staff there are eight bars of a three-part score—treble, alto, and bass—on a five-line staff; the bars are just as regular as they are in any modern music.

That the published music of Byrd and Gibbons was barred is proved by the beautifully-printed book 'Parthenia,' which was published in or about 1611, with the following title:—

Parthenia, or the Maydenhead of the first musicke that ever was printed for the Virginalls. Composed by three famous masters, William Byrd, Dr. John Bull, & Orlando Gibbons, Gentlemen of his Maties most illustrious Chappell. Dedicated to all the Masters and Lovers of Musick.

'Parthenia' was printed from copper plates engraved by William Hole; the barring is carried through both treble and bass staves, each of six lines, and is uniform and accurate.

I will now cite some early examples of barring: the first comes from the twelfth century, and is to be found in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; it is contained in a book of a treatise on law. I possess a photographed facsimile, and can vouch for the fact that the bar-lines, notes, and five-line staves are all of the same period. The music is a two-part composition, and this doubtless suggested the use of bars, to enable the singers to keep together. I have a facsimile of another composition preserved in the British Museum which dates from the twelfth or perhaps early thirteenth century; the music is again for two voices, and the bar-lines are drawn from the top of the upper four-line staff to the bottom of the lower four-line staff. This latter MS. is the more interesting from having belonged to Thame Abbey, Oxfordshire. I have a fourteenth-century manuscript copy of the celebrated treatise 'Tractatus super musicam mensuratum,' this was composed by John de Muris about 1321, and here we find many of the examples barred. This work contains the earliest mention of the minim note.

Another interesting autograph manuscript in my possession, entitled 'Incipunt præludium diversarum,' was written in 1448 by Adam Ileborgh of Stendall. It contains instructions for the organ, and is not only barred, but is also notable as being the earliest known example of music for the pedals. An example of a book containing single voice parts barred is 'Modus legendi et accentuandi Epistolas et Evangelia,' which was printed in Padua about 1490.

The well-known 'Musica getuscht,' by Virdung, printed at Basel in 1511, contains barred music for the lute partly on five-line staves and partly in tablature. Bar-lines were almost indispensable for lute music written in tablature; on the other hand, vocal music having the assistance of the note values over the words could, on occasion, be made fairly easy to read without the use of bar-lines, and we find printed books which exemplify this practice. There is a splendid book, printed in 1584, written by Emanuel Hadriani, entitled 'Pratum Musicum'; it is a large folio volume, and on opposite pages there are voice parts and words for soprano and bass voices, both unbarred; whilst the accompaniments for the lute are barred throughout.

I have traced chronologically thus far the use of bar-lines, and now I bring forward the earliest use of the word bar known to me. It is to be found in Thomas Morley's 'A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke,' published in 1597. On page 92 he says—referring to a music-type example in the text—'Here they set downe certain observations which they termed Inductions, as here you see in the first two barres. . . . In the third barre you have broken Sequialtera.' This quotation shows that at that time the use of the word was generally accepted and its meaning well understood. I need scarcely add that many of the examples given in Morley's book are barred.

It is somewhat curious that subsequent to the before-mentioned time there are to be found numerous instances of unbarred music, both manuscript and printed. It appears that during the first half of the seventeenth century composers had not adopted an uniform plan. Take the Brothers Lawes for instance; we find published in 1637—

A Paraphrase upon the Psalmes of David. By G. S. [George Sandys]. Set to new Tunes for private Devotion: and a thorow Base, for Voice, or Instrument. By Henry Lawes, Gentleman of His Majesties Chappell Royall.

This is a folio volume with the tunes barred throughout. The same work was printed in an octavo volume in 1648. I have also an autograph volume of music by William Lawes, who was killed at the siege of Chester in 1645, which is systematically barred; and yet in 1648 we find the following work published without bars:—

Choice Psalmes put into Musick. For three Voices. The most of which may properly enough be sung by any three, with a Thorough Base. Compos'd by Henry and William Lawes, Brothers; and Servants to His Majestie.

This work is printed in separate part-books, Cantus primus, Cantus secundus, Bassus, and Thorow Base.

A little later, in 1653, Henry Lawes published his 'Ayres and Dialogues for One Two and Three Voices,' marking the bar-lines continuously throughout the music; this plan he consistently carried out in the subsequent publications of 1655 and 1658. Reference has been made to the necessity of bars for producing a clear and readable score; it may therefore be of interest to note that Morley (1597) does not use the word score, but the more expressive term Partition, which we have now abandoned, but which is still retained by the French. Morley, on page 97, says 'Here it is set downe in partition, because you should the more easilie perceive the conveiance [conveyance, or movement] of the parts'; and again on page 103 'and therefore I have set it down in partition.'

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

Although Dr. Burney made no mark as a composer, reference may be made to one or two of his creative efforts. He claims to have been the first to compose pianoforte duets. This he does in a publication bearing the following title:—

Four | Sonatas, or Duets | for two performers on one | Piano Forte | or | Harpsichord | composed by |
CHAS^s BURNEY, Mus.D., | Price 10. 6. |

London. Printed for the author, and sold by
R. Bremner in the Strand, | and at all the Music
Shops. [1777.]

The Preface to this quartet of duet sonatas reads thus:—

As the following pieces are the first that have appeared in print of this kind, it may be necessary to say something concerning their utility, and the manner of performing them.

That great and varied effects may be produced by Duets upon Two keyed-instruments, has been proved by several ingenious compositions—some of which have been published in Germany; but the inconvenience of having two Harpsichords, or two Piano-Fortes, in the same room, and the short time they remain exactly in tune together, have prevented frequent trials, and even the cultivation of this species of music, notwithstanding all the advantages which, in other respects, it offers to musical students. The playing of Duets by two persons upon one instrument, is, however, attended with nearly as many advantages, without the inconvenience of crowding a room, or of frequent or double tuning: and so extensive is the compass of keyed-instruments, that the most full and elaborate compositions must, if played by one person, leave many parts of the scale unemployed; which, perhaps, first suggested the idea of applying pedals to the organ. And though, at first, the near approach of the hands of the different performers may seem awkward and embarrassing, a little use and contrivance with respect to the manner of placing them, and the choice of fingers, will soon remove that difficulty. Indeed, it frequently happens, that when there are two students upon the same keyed-instrument, in one house, they are in each other's way; however, by compositions of the following kind, they become reciprocally useful, and necessary companions in their musical exercises.

Besides the Amusement which such experiments will afford, they may be made subservient to two very useful purposes of improvement, as they will require a particular attention to Time, and to that clear-obscure which is produced by different degrees of Piano and Forte. Errors committed in the Measure, by either of the performers of these pieces, who may accelerate, retard, or otherwise break its proportions, will be sooner discovered, and consequently attended with more disagreeable effects, than if such errors were committed by a single player, unaccompanied; as the harmony, and consent of parts will be totally destroyed by the least deviation from strict Time of either player, unless the other give way, and conform to the mistakes that are made. And with respect to the Pianos and Fortes, each Performer should try to discover when he has the Principal Melody given to him, or when he is only to accompany that Melody; in order, either to make it more conspicuous, or merely to enrich its harmony. There is no fault in accompanying so destructive of good melody, taste, and expression, as the vanity with which young and ignorant Performers are too frequently possessed, of becoming Principals, when they are only Subalterns; and of being heard, when they have nothing to say that merits particular attention. If the part which would afford the greatest pleasure to the hearer be suffocated, and rendered inaudible, by too full, and too loud an accompaniment, it is like throwing the capital figure of a picture into the back-ground, or degrading the master into a servant.

It is hoped, however, that the great strides which the executive part of Music, at least, makes towards perfection in this metropolis, abounding at present in a greater number of capital performers, of almost every kind, than any other in Europe, will soon render such remarks as these useless; and that something analogous to Perspective, Transparency, and Contrast will be generally adopted in music, and be thought of nearly as much importance and make as great a progress among its students as they have lately done in the other art.

St. Martin's Street, Jan. 1777.

These duet sonatas are printed oblong folio size, with both parts, placed one above the other, printed on the same page, with the indications Cembalo 1^{mo}, Cembalo 2^{do}.

Two quaint titles of other works may be given, of which the first is:—

This, a publication of forty-four pages, starts with a composition in the key of A minor, followed by others in 'A# [major], B flat, C, and D.' As to

In the more leisurely life he afterwards lived at Chelsea College—the place is well worth a visit—Burney collected materials for a Dictionary of Music (never published) and wrote a life of Metastasio. He also contributed the articles on Music to Rees's Cyclopædia, for which he is said to have received the large sum of £1,000. From the valuable collection of Mr. T. W. Taphouse, of Oxford, we are permitted to print two interesting communications written by Dr. Burney, then aged seventy-six, to Dr. Callcott in 1802 and 1803. The first has reference to the origin of the terms leger-line and staff in music.

Chel. Coll. Saty. night. Oct 9,

DEAR CALLCOTT,

I have no doubt that a Leger-line in music is derived from the French. Leger means slight, inconsiderable, as well as light. We have Legerdmain, sleight of hand, from the same source. Shakespeare has legerity for lightness. But Leger, or Ledger, as a Counting-house book is derived from Legger, Dutch, any person or thing that is stationary. As a Leger Ambassador, a resident, one that continues at the Court to which he is sent. Leger-book, from the same Dutch word—a book that lies on the Counter to receive entries of every transaction of the day.

I have no doubt neither of staff for the 3, 4, or 5 lines and in Canto fermo and secular music being called a staff. It was begun by one line drawn through the primitive musical characters, before the invention of notes and formation of time-table. Then 2—for two parts in the first attempts at counterpoint. Then 3, 4—to which Gregorian notes were still confined; and as the compass of each vocal part was extended—5 lines—6, 8 and even 12 were used in the Tablature for the org., in the early pt of the 16 centy. During the whole of that and the subsequent centy 6 lines were used in the org. pt of all Cathedral books; and it was not till the beginning of the last centy that the staff in books for keyed instruments was settled at 5 lines.

Staff, for a stanza, or series of verses, versus intercalaris regularly arranged, is derived from Staf, Icelandic. The French call the staff in music, la Portée; and the leger-lines, les lignes postiches. I know not what you mean by saying that the word staff is used in psalmody, for two verses—singing a stave, in the language of rural psalmody, and Dr. Busby, is but going once through a tune whether double or single, of 8 or of 4 lines. Dryden calls a stanza a staff when he says: "Cowley found out that no kind of staff is proper for an Epic Poem." Who first used the word staff for the 5 lines I pretend not to say—and God forbid that either you or I sh^d ever live to have nothing better to do than to trace its genealogy up to the source! The authority of Lock and Holden and every English professor now will hold you harmless, among whom you have full permission to add that of

Yours sincerely,

CHAS. BURNEY.

The next, an extract from a letter also to Dr. Callcott, dated January, 1803, gives some interesting information concerning the introduction of the Swell in organs:—

The Swell, to my own knowledge, was common in our organs long before Snetzler [born about 1710] arrived in England, and he told me himself, who worked at the famous organ at Haarlem, that I sh^d find no swell in Germ. organs. I rather think that old Harris & Byfield (grandfather of the present Byfield) were the inventors of the swell, by enclosing a number of pipes in a 3-inch deal box wh^{ch} was gradually opened and closed by a pedal, as at present. In the year 1744, when I first arrived in London, I found a swell in all Byfield's organs, and even in Father Smith's organ in St. Paul's Cathedral, the Temple, St. Andrews, & St. Martins-in-the-fields, made (the 2 last) by Schwarbrook. But the swells in those old organs were addenda by Byfield and Harris. Snetzler first put a reed stop in the Lynn org. under my eye [in 1754], wh^{ch} he called a Fr. Horn—it was a louder and coarser kind of Hautboy.

Burney's declining days were made still easier when Fox (in 1806) gave him a pension of £300 a year. In 1807 he had a paralytic stroke from which, however, he recovered. He then occupied much of his time in arranging his papers with a view to writing his autobiography. Would that he had written it, instead of leaving to his daughter Fanny the task of compiling, as she did after her father's death, her 'Memoirs of Dr. Burney,' published in 1832. The biography is written in a style of such stilted magniloquence as to be almost ludicrous in its unnaturalness. Moreover, Madame D'Arblay confessed to having destroyed many of her father's papers; in all probability much of this confiscated matter would have been of supreme interest to us, and might have thrown fresh light on the musical life of England during the greater part of the eighteenth century.

In the year 1810, Burney was elected a Foreign Member of the Institute of France. But a still more important incident in his long life belongs to that period—his conversion, by Samuel Wesley, to Bachism, pace 'Old Sam.' It is true that Burney knew and admired the English Bach (John Christian of that eminent family); but he had by no means become enamoured of the imperishable compositions of the Bach, John Sebastian, the illustrious father of the said John Christian. The circumstances attending this conversion form perhaps the most interesting incident in old Burney's career, the more so because it must be remembered that he had then become an octogenarian. We may let Samuel Wesley tell the story in his own inimitable letters, which fortunately have been preserved.

Writing to his old friend and brother Bachist, Benjamin Jacob (organist of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road, from 1794 to 1825), Wesley says:—

September 17th, 1808.

DEAR SIR,—I am much obliged by your ingenious and circumstantial Detail of your success with Saint Sebastian, as you very properly term him, and am rejoiced to find that you are likely to regard his Works with me as a musical Bible, unrivalled and inimitable.

I am grieved to witness in my valuable Friend Doctor Burney's Critique (for he is a man whom I equally respect and love), so slight an acquaintance with the great and matchless Genius whom he professes to analyze: and I have however much satisfaction in being able to assure you, from my own personal experience, that his present judgment of our Demi-God is of a very different Nature from that at the Time he imprudently, incautiously, and we may add, ignorantly pronounced so rash and false a verdict (although a false Verdict is a contradiction in Terms), as that which I this Day read for the first Time upon "the greatest Master of Harmony in any Age or Country."

It is now I think nearly a twelvemonth since I wrote to the Doctor respecting my profound admiration (and Adoration, if you like it as well) of Sebastian: I stated to him that I had made a Study of his Preludes and Fugues, adding that his compositions had opened to me an entirely new musical World, which was to me at least as surprising as (when a child) I was thunderstruck by the opening of the Dettingen Te Deum, at the Bristol Cathedral with about an hundred Performers (a great Band in those Days). I went into something like a general Description of what I conceived to be his characteristic Beauties, and particularly specified Air as one of the chief and most striking. I have by me the Doctor's reply to my letter, although I cannot at the present moment advert to it, but I fully remember his observing in nearly the following Words:—"In order to be consistent with myself with regard to the great Sebastian Bach, before I precisely coincide with you, I must refer to what I have written at various Times and in various Places of my History, Travels, &c., in which I had occasion to mention him; but I shall feel exceedingly gratified in hearing his elaborate and erudite Compositions performed by you (for I never yet HEARD any one of them), and can tell you that I have a very curious and beautiful Copy of his Fugues, which was presented to me many years since by his Son Emanuel, and which I shall have much pleasure in shewing you."

When I waited on my venerable Friend he had been kind enough to previously lay upon his Music Desk the MS. in question (together with several other beautiful and superb Works of our immortal Master); but when I came to examine this said rare Present, how much was I surprised to find it so full of scriptural Faults, that it was not without some Difficulty I could manage to do justice to one of the Fugues which I had been formerly the most familiar with; and although I did not boggle, yet I played with extreme Discomfort. My Friend, however, was extremely delighted, and the very first Part of his Critique expressed his Wonder how such abstruse harmony and such perfect and enchanting melody could have been so marvellously united!

What a convincing Proof this is, that his former criticism upon our matchless Author was an hasty and improvident Step!

I conceive that the Fact stands thus: When Burney was in Germany, the universal Plaudits and Panegyrics upon the Father of Universal Harmony were so interesting that it would have been impossible for him to have avoided giving such a Man a Place in his Account of Musical Authors in his General History. Nevertheless it appears very evidently from the erroneous Sentence he has pronounced therein upon the Comparative Merit of him and Handel, that he never could have taken due Pains to make himself Master of the Subject, otherwise his late candid acknowledgement would not have been made, and is proof sufficient that he only wanted experience of the Truth to make him ready and willing to own it.

I must also tell you another Piece of News;—namely that this imperfect and incorrect volume, this valuable and inestimable Gift of Sebastian's dutiful Son, happens to contain only the 24 first Preludes and Fugues; all written in the Soprano Clef (to make them more easily understood, I suppose), and the Preludes so miserably mangled and mutilated that had I not met them in such a collection as that of the learned and highly illuminated Doctor Burney, I verily believe that I should have exclaimed, "An Enemy hath done this." I should have at once concluded that such a manuscript could have been made only by him who was determined to disgrace, instead of promote the cause of correct Harmony.

Ever since I had the privilege of so great a triumph (for I can call it nothing else) over the Doctor's Prejudice, he has evinced the most cordial veneration for our Sacred Musician, and when I told him that I was in Possession of 24 more such precious Relicks, he was all aghast in finding that there could be any Productions of such a Nature which he had not seen: this again is another proof of his having hastily judged, and also how remiss the Germans must have been not to have made him better acquainted with the Works of their transcendent Countryman.

The next specimen of Wesley's droll enthusiasm in his Bach-in-England propaganda is an extract from another letter to Benjamin Jacob, dated March 2, 1809. He says:—

It's droll enough, that amongst these is inserted a beautiful Air which is published along with a sett of Emmanuel Bach's Lessons, and which I saw at Bath. I am very much inclined to think that this Son, like many others, made but little scruple of robbing his Father; and that he was not concerned for his Honour seems plain enough by the vile and most diabolical Copy that he gave Dr. Burney as a Present, and from which the latter was wise enough to judge of and damn his Works (as he thought), but the Phoenix must always revive.

Later in the year (September 4, 1809) Wesley pens another of his extraordinary epistles to Jacob, in the course of which he says:—

I have just received a letter from Dr. Burney, an extracted Portion of which will not be uninteresting to you. "I believe Mr. Salamon is now out of Town; but when I saw him last, in talking of our great Sebastian, he said you were in Possession of some Sonatas of his divine Manufacture, with a very fine Violin Part to them which he wished me to hear. I have no Violin in Order; but when I return home (Dr. B. is now at Bulstrode, the seat of the Duke of Portland), and you are both at Leisure, I wish you would prevail on him to fix a Day, and to send one of his own Violins any time before 2 o'clock; while you are charming me with two Parts, I shall act in a Triple Capacity and play the parts of Pit, Box, and Gallery in rapturously applauding the Composition and Performance."

You see one is never too old to learn, and here is an instance that it is never too late to mend!

What more could the Dr. have said, even had he originally been the like Enthusiast with ourselves in the Cause of Truth.

His Repentance (tho' he does not profess it yet in Words) seems so evident from the zealous Expressions he uses, that I really think we must cordially forgive the past, for we can hardly expect him when tottering over the Grave, and having attained (whether justly or otherwise) a Reputation for Musical Criticism, publicly to revoke what he advanced at so distant a Period of Time, and when perhaps he thinks that his Strictures are forgotten, or at least overbalanced by his present Acknowledgement of the real State of the Fact.

As soon as I can command an Hour, I will set about my deliberate Opinion on the various and inimitable excellencies of THE MAN, which I think will settle the Business at least as decisively as our Challenge to J—ACK P—UDDING.

Adieu for the present,—we must Contrive one more Pull at Surry before I hyke over to Staffordshire.

Kindest Regards to all from

Your Sincere Friend,

S. WESLEY.

J. P.

Tho' J. P. refuses to give up his Name
To muffle his Malice a Hood in,
The matter amounts to exactly the same,
For his Nonsense proclaims 'tis J—ack P—udding.

Although the concluding letters relating to Burney's conversion to Bachism are not dated, they can with safety be assigned to the year of grace 1810. The first is again addressed to the Surrey Chapel organist:—

DEAR FRIEND,—I am in the utmost Distress, and there is no one on Earth but yourself who can help me out of it. Dr. Burney is starke staring mad to hear Sebastian's Sonatas, and I have told him all how and about your adroit management of his Music in general. He was immediately resolved on hearing you on the Clavicebalem, and me on the Fiddle at them. He has appointed Monday next at 12 o'clock for our coming to him, as this is the only time he has left before a second Excursion into the Country. You see it is an extreme Case. I had appointed three private Pupils for Monday, but shall put them all off to Tuesday. Would to Heaven that you may be able to do the like: The Triumph of Burney over his own Ignorance and Prejudice is such a glorious event that surely we ought to make some sacrifice to enjoy it.

I mentioned young Kollman as quite capable of playing the Sonatas, but you will see by the enclosed (just received) that he prefers you. Pray comply in this arduous Enterprise, Remember our Cause, "Good will towards Men" is at the Bottom of it, and when Sebastian flourishes here, there will be at least more musical "Peace on Earth."

You see we are utterly ruined unless you come forward To-morrow.—Think of what we shall have to announce to the Public; that Dr. Burney (who has heard almost all the Music of other Folks) should be listening with Delight at almost 90 years old to an Author whom he so unknowingly and rashly had condemned!

Only imagine what an Effect this must have in confounding and putting to Silence such pigmy puerile Puppies as Williams and Smith, and a Farrago of other such musical Odds and Ends.

The above letter may have been called forth in consequence of a little note, penned by Burney, which reads thus:—

Let me but know and I shall be sempre not at home to any other man creatures. If you individually wish for me to compare notes about—name some day and hour as convenient as possible to your own engagements, and I am as ever yours in all friendship truth and affection. C. B.

Whether or not Wesley took his fiddle and his friend (Jacob) to Chelsea in order to achieve 'The Triumph of Burney over his own Ignorance and Prejudice' is unknown. Probably he did, with the result that the eighty-four-year-old historian evinced quite an Oliver Twistian craving for more! At all events Burney wrote to Wesley the following funny farrago:—

MY DEAR FRIEND

Now my French Packet is off my mind, I have time to think of your last plan of rehearsing the quips and quiddities of the great S. B. to the best advantage, concerns wch I must have seemed very cold (in spite of the heat of the weather) by the enumeration of difficulties that, at first, occurred to me for want of Room sufficient for 2 large instruments of equal force & magnitude; & Time, in one day, to do justice to, and enjoy the effects of such learned and ingenious arcana. But, allowing the old adage, wch you have quoted, to be just: that "second thoughts are best"—instead of sending you & Sigr Novello to a P. F. maker's to find 2 Instrum^{ts} of equal magnitude, nicely tuned together; upon examining my little parlour or keeping room (in health & warm weather), I find, when unbelittered, that there wd be sufficient space for 2 such first rate Giants to lie along side each other—and that when I thought of sending you & your friend to a P. F. shop for trial of your 30 very comical pieces (as the most learned, ingenious, & original productions of Haydn, Mozart, & Beethoven, are often said to be, by ignorant and vulgar hearers), I never once thought of my sweet & precious self, to whom your performance wd be as inaudible as the music of the spheres—for I never intend going into the open air again.

But now, though I have caught a fresh cold, and have 2 decayed teeth in my upper jaw, that give me a very acute twinge whenever I inhale fresh air; I beg, during the warm weather, your performance may be within my obtuse ear-shot, that I may acquaint the Larvæ I shall meet wth (post obit.) how the wonderful wonders produced by the pen of the great S. B. have been played, as a game at all fours, by the zealous and indefatigable Messrs. Wesley and Novello.

Therefore send your Instrument, name your day, or days, & your hours, before the end of the present month, & I hope nothing sinister will occasion a new procrastination of our promised pleasure.

C. B.

Suppose we decimate the 30 variations, & divide them into 3 Decads: performing 10 once, or twice, if we like or dislike them much, each day? wch will allow us time to breathe, digest, & judge.

The endorsement, by Vincent Novello, of this comical communication from the Chelsea veteran speaks for itself:—

My dear friend Sam Wesley, who has endorsed this Letter, as having been sent to him by Dr. Burney (the Musical Historian), was so kind as to present it to me, as it referred to the very pleasant meeting we had together at the Doctor's apartments in Chelsea Hospital, when I played the whole of the "30 Variations" by Sebastian Bach as Duets with Sam Wesley, to the great delight of Burney, who acknowledged to us both, that he had formed a very inadequate opinion of Sebastian Bach's fertility of invention and versatility of style, till he had heard our performance of those extraordinary specimens of counterpoint, called the "30 Variations."

VINCENT NOVELLO.

The next letter, also from Burney, may fitly conclude this most interesting episode occurring in the sunset of his long, eventful, and honourable career:—

To Sam Wesley 11 Adams Row Hamstead Road.

With best compts. ut Virtuossimo Sign Vincenzo Novello.

I shall now begin my final note in the dual number, with

My dear Friends,

If you cd send your Lumber-dy Instrument sooner than 10, tomorrow morn^g. I sh^d. be right glad; that it may be tuned in unison with mine: for if its pitch sh^d. be altered, the 2 giants will not remain in perfect friend^{sh}. an hour. While the weather continues warm, I had rather wait on ye at 11, than 12 or 1. I am now entirely for the performance of the 30 Waryations de suite: as you two virtuoso gemmen, doubtless, are so parfit in all these pretty chunes, that you'll go on swimming from beginning to end, as if wind and tide were both strongly in your favour. I think the forte, i.e. fortes, may begin to storm these works of Engineer Bach, before 12. And if we have any time to spare, after being played over, we can talk them over—or (what wd be still petter auct coot), if little i were to say bis, there might, may-hap, be time for a Da Capo. So fin Dimaroi, at least, God bless ye!

C. B.

That humour was a marked characteristic in the personality of Dr. Burney, the foregoing Bach correspondence bears abundant testimony. His love of fun found an outlet in his rhyming propensity even in his old age as, for instance, in a letter to his daughter Fanny, in which he refers to himself:—

As blind as a beetle, as deaf as a post,
Whose longevity now is all he can boast.

And again, in a subsequent letter to Madame D'Arblay, written shortly before his death, the octogenarian musician says:—

Here I am in spite of the old gentleman and his scythe. And the few people I am able to see tell me I look better, speak better, and walk better than I did 'ever so long ago.' God knows how handsome I shall be by and bye! People wonder, secluded as

I am for ever from the world and its joys, how I can cut a joke and be silly: but when I have no serious sufferings, a book, or a pen, makes me forget all the world, and even myself, the best of all oblivions.

The life-story of a very remarkable man has now been told. On April 14, 1814, the old historian—having lived to see descendants even unto the fourth generation—drew his last breath in his rooms at Chelsea Hospital. The Morning Post, in an appreciative obituary notice, said of him:—

He will be long remembered by a large circle of friends for the solidity and extent of his acquirements and the urbanity of his manners. He has lived to see his family distinguish themselves equally by their talents and virtues. . . . His manners were peculiarly easy, spirited, and gentlemanly, and he had all the graces of the Chesterfield School, without any of its studied formality.

Burney's remains are interred in the south-west corner of the private burying-ground of Chelsea Hospital. A simple headstone to the grave records the fact in the following inscription:—

In memory of ELIZABETH BURNEY died 20th October 1796
aged 68.
Also of
CHARLES BURNEY MUS.D.
Husband of the above who departed this life
April 12th 1814. Aged 86.

A tablet to Dr. Burney's memory is placed in the North Choir Aisle—known as the Musicians' Aisle—of Westminster Abbey, and reads thus:—

SACRED TO THE MEMORY
OF
CHARLES BURNEY MUS.D. F.R.S.

WHO, FULL OF YEARS, AND FULL OF VIRTUES;
THE PRIDE OF HIS FAMILY, THE DELIGHT OF SOCIETY;
THE UNRIVALLED CHIEF, AND SCIENTIFIC

HISTORIAN

OF HIS TUNEFUL ART!

RELOVED, REVERED, REGRETTED,
BREATHED, IN CHELSEA COLLEGE, HIS LAST SIGH!
LEAVING TO POSTERITY A FAME UNBLEMISHED, BUILT ON THE NOBLE BASIS OF INTELLECTUAL ATTAINMENTS.

HIGH PRINCIPLES AND PURE BENEVOLENCE, GOODNESS WITH GAIETY, TALENTS WITH TASTE, WERE OF HIS GIFTED MIND THE BLENDED ATTRIBUTES:
WHILE THE GENIAL HILARITY OF HIS AIRY SPIRITS
ANIMATED, OR SOFTENED, HIS EVERY EARTHLY TOIL: AND A CONSCIENCE WITHOUT REPROACH, PREPARED,

IN THE WHOLE TENOUR OF HIS MORTAL LIFE,
THROUGH THE MEDIATION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, HIS SOUL FOR HEAVEN.—AMEN.

BORN APRIL 7th O.S. 1726. DIED APRIL 12th 1814.

It may be observed that the wording of the above, composed by his daughter Fanny (Madame D'Arblay), differs slightly from the text given at the end of vol. iii. of her 'Memoirs of Dr. Burney.'

Occasional Notes.

There are in this loud stunning tide
Of human care and crime,
With whom the melodies abide
Of th' everlasting chime;
Who carry music in their heart
Through dusky lane and wrangling mart,
Plying their daily task with busier feet,
Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat.

JOHN KEBLE.

Fifty years have come and gone since Alberto Randegger, as a young man aged twenty-two, hoisted his artistic flag, or set up his artistic standard, in London, which 'smoky nest' has ever since been his home. The story of his coming here merely on a visit—how he went fast asleep during his first hearing of The Messiah, conducted by Costa, and all the rest of it—is fully told in the Biographical Sketch of the distinguished musician which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of October, 1899. His year of Jubilee has arrived with 1904, and what could be more appropriate than that his colleagues on the professorial staffs of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music should mark their sense of Mr. Randegger's long services to the cause of music by presenting him with an address, signed by all those connected with our two foremost music-teaching Institutions? The terms of this congratulatory document are thus set forth:—

DEAR CAVALIÈRE RANDEGGER,

A number of your friends consider it meet to mark the completion of your fiftieth year of active musical life in England by some demonstration of personal regard and esteem.

Apart from your widely-acknowledged powers as an exceptionally successful professor of singing, you are prominently distinguished in many other branches of the art on whose behalf you have laboured in a truly cosmopolitan and liberal spirit in our country during the greater portion of a long and busy life.

Your gifts as a Conductor and Composer are equally well known, and the rare combination of talent which you have so conspicuously exhibited has at all times been at the service not only of the musicians but of the music of your adopted country.

It is thought that this most fitting moment to acknowledge a gratitude which has always been felt should not be permitted to pass without offering some record of thanks to a Master and friend.

As the signatories in accordance with your own desire are restricted to members of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music they represent a very small proportion of those who would have liked to join in this address, but you will find all branches of your profession included.

We offer you our warm congratulations on your Musical Jubilee in Great Britain, and in the hope that you may long be spared to add to the benefits which you have already conferred on lovers of music we subscribe ourselves your affectionate friends and well-wishers—
(The signatures follow).

On behalf of many who had not the pleasure and privilege of appending their names to this address, we desire to join very heartily in its chorus of congratulation to a gifted master of music.

An interesting musical landmark in London has just disappeared by the demolition of the house in Great Portland Street (No. 79), at which Mendelssohn lodged during his first four visits to the Metropolis—in 1829, 1832, and 1833 (twice). There, on a Sunday in May (the 24th), 1829, he composed his charming setting of Thomas Moore's words, 'By Celia's arbour' (The Garland), and he used to practise upon a dumb keyboard while sitting up in bed. He made large demands upon the bread-and-butter puddings daintily manufactured by his landlady, Mrs. Heinke. At Mendelssohn's request this, his favourite dish, was placed in the cupboard of his sitting-room, so that when he returned home late at night from a concert or a dinner-party (!) he could help himself to its cold contents to his heart's content. The house at which Mendelssohn stayed during his London visits of 1844, 1846, and 1847 still stands. It was the official residence of his friend Karl Klingemann, then Secretary of the Hanoverian Legation; it is to be found at 4, Hobart Place, Eaton Square, facing the south side of St. Peter's Church.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in his speech at the Royal Academy of Music prize-giving, uttered some wise words on the subject of the start in life of the musical student, that anxious period immediately following his course of training. After having referred to the subject of Scholarships and the Palmer Trust Fund and their potentialities, Sir Alexander said:—

In these days much, indeed everything, is done for the student while he is a student. There are scholarships, prizes, exhibitions and public appearances galore. Chances the many, which we of earlier days—not so long ago either—dreamed about and struggled hard for. But much of this care for the student's welfare comes to a sudden stop—seems to cease when he ceases to be a student.

Perhaps the time has now come when some of this good-will and foresight might be made to flow into broader and deeper channels—might be directed to some of the many national anomalies, deficiencies, and shortcomings associated with music and musicians, and which have yet to be remedied before those excellent intentions towards native music can produce the results they are evidently designed to bring about.

Money alone will not do it. Sympathy, interest, broader and perhaps fairer views, more outlet and room, more public and private employment of our own people, and a better protection of our brain-work would be of some service.

These are not problems which the music schools can or ought to be expected to solve. Their solutions lie much deeper down than we can dig, and besides, our duties point in totally different directions.

But it is ill marching, as old Omar Khayyam has it, to 'the sound of a distant drum,' and it might do no harm if these encouraging instruments were a trifle more audible to the young recruits—and even to the old soldiers.

No one will question the truth of these weighty words spoken by the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and has not he himself tasted of the bitter cup of early struggles? It would not be difficult to enumerate some of the desiderata to which Sir Alexander alludes. A National Opera House, among others. What can be done? It is difficult to suggest a remedy, but this idea has been conveyed to us by one whose opinion and experience are of value: There are several towns and districts in England where a clever young violinist (or violoncellist) is needed—a well-equipped musician, steady and diligent. For the first year or two he would probably not find work enough for his entire support and would therefore need financial help. Here, then, is an opportunity for a local Carnegie, or a committee of Carnegies, lovers of music, to temporarily subsidize a young professional such as we have mentioned. In a short time he would be firmly established and on his own resources, and, moreover, he would in many ways help forward the musical regeneration of the neighbourhood in which his lot would be cast.

Mr. W. Barclay Squire, of the British Museum, contributes to the recently issued Sammelbände der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft (July-Sept.) an exhaustive article, occupying no fewer than 75 pages, on 'Purcell's Dramatic Music.' The information he has there gathered together, and so admirably set forth, is most valuable, and Mr. Barclay Squire is to be warmly congratulated upon having accomplished an excellent piece of bibliographical work. Another researchful article in the same issue is entitled Bibliographie berliozienne, and is from the able pen of M. J.-G. Prod'homme, of Paris. Here again is a splendid example of patient investigation and painstaking accuracy, for the writer has compiled a list of the articles contributed by Berlioz to various French newspapers during a period of exactly forty years—from 1823 to 1863. This index to the extraordinary journalistic output of the eminent French composer is most useful for reference, and the compilation of it bears testimony to M. Prod'homme's industry.

At the Summer Meeting of the Cambridge University Extension, recently held at Exeter, Dr. J. C. Bridge, organist of Chester Cathedral, delivered, on August 4, an interesting lecture on 'Music under the Tudors.' The musical illustrations to Dr. Bridge's instructive discourse consisted of the following selections:—

The Shepherds' Song. From the Tailor and Shearmen's Pageant in the Coventry Mystery Plays.

Anthems { Rejoice in the Lord ... John Redford.
Mock not God's Name Christopher Tye.

Part-Song, Pastime with good company

King Henry VIII.

Madrigal, Adieu, sweet Amaryllis ... John Wilbye.

Ballet, or Fa-la, Now is the month of maying

Thomas Morley.

Virginal pieces (a) The Bells ... W. Byrd.

(b) The King's Jig Dr. John Bull.

Played by Dr. Bridge.

Shakespearean Songs—

(a) It was a lover and his lass Thomas Morley.

(b) O Willow, willow! ... Traditional.

(c) Full fathom five ... R. Johnson.

(d) Where the bee sucks ...

Sung by Miss Kathleen Wood, and accompanied by Miss Dorothy Wood.

The choral music was well rendered by a choir of forty voices under the able direction of Dr. Wood, organist of Exeter Cathedral, who also gave two enjoyable organ recitals in the Cathedral before large and appreciative audiences during this Summer Meeting.

Miss Wakefield has contributed an article to the August issue of The Commonwealth on 'The aims and objects of Musical Competition Festivals, and how to form them.' No one is more competent to write on this important educational subject than Miss Wakefield, who, in starting the Musical Competition movement in England nineteen years ago in Westmorland villages, sowed the seed of an educational plant that has taken root and spread so rapidly that thirty-six Centres are now being worked in various parts of England with gratifying results. In answer to the question: What are the special aims and objects of Musical Competition Festivals? Miss Wakefield thus makes reply :—

First, what, I ask you, apart from competitions, may be generally said to be the highest attainable object in connection with music, bearing in mind that the highest of all, the composition of the greatest music, is open only to the geniuses of the world? I believe the highest attainable object is to 'create the love and in consequence the demand for the greatest music, by the greatest number.' There is, to-day, no lack of splendid education for those who intend to make music the business and profession of their lives: neither are there any difficulties of instruction for those whom I will call the cultured pleasure seekers in the paths of music. But the object of this movement, as I have already said, is to reach the 'greatest number,' which must represent the great general public, whose life is mainly spent in earning its livelihood. This getting hold of the great mass of the people, whether in towns or rural districts, is, I believe, the great means of fostering a real national love of music, and this is surely one of the principal aims of these Musical Competitions.

The entire article, which is very practical and brightly written, may be perused with profit.

The Return—in other words the annual Blue Book—of the British Museum for the year ending March 31, 1904, has now been issued. In accordance with our usual custom, we cull a few items of musical interest from its pages. Under the head of Accessions in the Department of Printed Books we find that—

7,751 Musical Publications have been added to the collection. Of these 7,377 were received under the provisions of the Copyright Act, 318 by Colonial Copyright, and 56 acquired by Purchase.

This shows a considerable falling off in the number received last year—1,052 fewer compositions. Can it be that British musicians are becoming less creative, or can any other cause—e.g., the pirates—be assigned for this unmistakable slump?

The most interesting accessions to the collection of Printed Music during the last official year have been :—

Trombetti, Ascanio. "Musica fatta sopra le conclusioni di Leggi. Bologna, 1587." Only two other copies, one at Rome and one at Bologna, are known to exist.

Marenzio, Luca. Third Book of Madrigals for six voices. Venice, 1589—1594.

Vitali, Filippo. "L'Àretusa, Favola in Musica." Rome, 1620. One of the earliest Italian operas.

Caccini, Francesca. "La Liberazione di Ruggiero." Florence, 1625.

In the Department of Manuscripts only two Accessions are recorded under Music :—

Mass in D for 5 voices, by Giovanni Battista Pergolesi. 18th cent.

"Villanelle . . . per suonare et cantare su la Chitarra alla Spagnola di Giovanni Casalotti." 17th cent.

Herr Felix Weingartner has been appointed conductor of the Sheffield Musical Festival in succession to Mr. Henry J. Wood, who has resigned that office. Dr. Coward, however, retains the post of chorus-master, the duties of which he has discharged with rare distinction from the inauguration, in 1896, of this important music-making. The next Festival is to be held in the autumn of 1905.

Each issue of the Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft contains a list of current articles in musical journals published in various countries. In this Zeitschriftenschau of the August issue an article on the Musicians' Company Loan Exhibition which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES is said to have been written by 'D. Crotched'!

Professor Niecks strikes a somewhat pessimistic note in an article he has contributed to the August number of The Parents' Review, the monthly magazine of the Parents' National Education Union. The Professor discourses in his usual thoughtful manner on the subject of 'The place of music in education.' He is of opinion that instead of music being a powerful factor in education, it is as good as no factor at all. 'This is not the fault of music,' he says, 'but of teachers and parents, and more the fault of the parents than of the teachers.' He continues :—

It is unfortunately no exaggeration to say that more than ninety-nine per cent. of our music teaching cannot rightly claim to be what it pretends to be, and is little better than a horrible, ghastly waste of time, energy, and money. What does the usual music teaching do? It does not cultivate the ear, it does not refine the taste and manners, and it does not improve the morals. All it accomplishes, if it accomplishes anything, comes to this: the attainment of some degree of mechanical skill, unaccompanied by the intelligence how to use it and of the knowledge of the thing for which it is to be used. Unless you call the memorising of dates, history, and the memorising of the names of towns, rivers, mountains, capes, and seas, geography, you cannot call the customary unmusical drill, music teaching.

As indicating the first step in the remedial journey towards the goal of success the Professor says :—

Now let us see what should and what should not be done if the learning of music is to be fruitful and worth the time, trouble, and money spent on it. To be successful and avoid waste, the first condition is to have an object worth aiming at and to keep that object constantly in view, that is, to choose the ways and means best adapted for the attainment of the end. Learning to sing by rote a limited number of melodies, or being drilled into playing a number of pieces, that is, being trained to imitate like a parrot or doing tricks like a dog, cannot be regarded as a worthy object; for it is either not educational at all or merely to an infinitesimal degree, and much better results can be obtained at less cost by mechanical contrivances such as musical boxes, pianolas, and phonographs. On the other hand, it is a worthy object to develop so important a sense as that of hearing both for general and for musical purposes, and to learn the tonal language both with a view to understanding and using it. Well, the usual teaching of music leads in the vast majority of cases to none of those ends; and if the ends are nevertheless attained in a small minority of cases, it is so thanks to exceptional talents and circumstances.

His last words, addressed to parents, admit of no dispute :—

What parents, then, ought to aim at in their musical provision for their children is not the ability of performing a few musical tricks, but a knowledge of and a taste for music. But to attain that aim parents ought to fix upon a competent teacher, and give that teacher a free hand; and further, ought to take an interest in their children's music, not by exhibiting them at parties, but by listening to them and encouraging them in private.

That word competent. Ay, there's the rub!

A correspondent residing in the North of Ireland writes as follows :—

I should like, with your permission, to draw the attention of the various pianoforte examination boards to the fact that the pianofortes provided for the higher examinations are more often than not in very bad order. I think it most unfair that a candidate for an examination, after practising upon a good instrument, should be expected to sit down to a pianoforte with worn-out action, and thereupon to do himself or herself justice.

The protest of our correspondent is perfectly justifiable, and the matter is one that calls for attention and rectification.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, WASHINGTON.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS AND ITS MUSIC.

The 'Report of the Librarian of Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903' is a substantial volume of 600 pages, issued from the Government Printing Office at Washington. Moreover, unlike most of the Government Blue-Books issued in the old country, it is an unusually interesting tome. Let us take a few dips into its informing pages.

The book is divided into three parts:—

- (1) List of Officers, Report, Statistics, &c.
- (2) Select list of recent Purchases.
- (3) Report on Copyright Legislation.

Its frontispiece is an exterior view (which we have ventured to reproduce) of the stately edifice at Washington called the Library of Congress, the British Museum of America, and there are five excellent plans of different parts of the vast building, from 'the cellar' to 'the attic' as they are domestically described.

The statistical portion of the book records that on June 30, 1903, the Music entries numbered 366,616, an increase on the previous year of 21,105, the latter figures thereby representing the number of pieces, &c., received in one year.

The staff of the Division of Music—working under the vigilant direction of Mr. Oscar George Theodore Sonneck—are, with their emoluments, thus stated in the Report:—

MUSIC: For Chief of Division, $2,000; 1 Assistant, $1,400; 1 Assistant, $1,000; 2 Assistants at $720 each; 1 Messenger boy, $360: in all, $6,200.

Part 3 of the volume is a 'Report of the Register of Copyrights on Copyright Legislation.' This section, occupying some 150 pages, includes a useful and valuable digest of all American copyright enactments, in addition to a summary of Foreign copyright laws now in force, and other information of legal importance.

We have left Part 2 of the Report to the end of this notice because of its musical interest. This 'Select list of recent purchases' may best be described in a circular letter, signed by Mr. O. G. Sonneck, Chief of the Division of Music, which has accompanied the copy of the volume sent to us. The letter—headed 'Library of Congress. Division of Music. Washington, D.C.,' and dated May 1, 1904—reads:—

'The Division of Music in the Library was set apart in the reorganization of the Library in 1897, when all the music that had accumulated since the foundation of the Library in 1800 was given into its custody. With the exception of a few rarities, the collection was almost entirely the result of deposits under the copyright law. For reasons connected with the history of copyright legislation, only a portion of the music entered for copyright between 1783 and 1818 was in possession of the Library; but that issued since 1819, so far as representing the press of the United States, was represented in a collection which was fairly comprehensive and, of course, unique. Of European publications, the Library in 1897 possessed very few prior to 1891, and these principally works by American composers. Since 1891, when protection under our copyright laws was extended to the works of foreign authors, the collection came to embrace music which foreign publishers cared thus to enter for protection. As all the Continental countries making important contributions to music, with the exception of Austria-Hungary, Russia, Norway and Sweden, have been included in this protection, and as the European publishers copyrighted the majority of their publications (and frequently works by Russians, Austrians, etc.), the Library of Congress, under the international copyright law of 1891, came to acquire a very extensive and representative collection of contemporary European music.

'Within the past three years, however, there has been systematic effort and a very considerable expenditure to increase the scope of the collection in order to make it a center of research to the student, critic, and historian of music.

'In the report of the Librarian for the past year the collections in the Division of Music were thus briefly described:—

"The Library of Congress now possesses a good working collection of the literature on music fundamental to the student of the history and theory of music, and the collection of music is no longer limited to that which has come from copyright. In order that it should also contain representatives of the best printed scores of classical and standard material, the works of the classical composers have been purchased in complete editions, so far as they have been published; and those of the more notable modern masters have been acquired in a selection intended to represent their compositions in opera, oratorio, cantata, orchestral and chamber music.

"Special attention has also been paid to early American psalmody, Civil War music, and to serial publications of a historical character, such as the Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich. Finally, efforts have been made toward the acquisition of dramatic music in full score, that the student may consult the standard operas in their original form and at first source."

'Such gaps as necessarily still exist will, it is hoped, disappear as the plans for a systematic development of the collection are carried into effect.

'On July 1, 1903, the total number of volumes and pieces of music in the Division was estimated at 366,735, this being an increase of 21,224 over the preceding year. In addition, the Division had in its custody some 4,700 volumes and pamphlets dealing with the history and theory of music. Not included in this enumeration was instructive material estimated at about 6,000 volumes, pamphlets and pieces, since set apart in a special section of the collection. The accessions during the past ten months would bring the grand total of the collection to nearly 400,000 items.

'This collection will be made as freely accessible as any other in the Library of Congress, and the Library of Congress is now the National Library of the United States, entirely free and accessible, without formality.'

The Library of Congress has some considerable leeway to make up before it can vie with Great Russell Street in the value and importance of its treasures; but the natural enterprise of the American is sure to find its full outlet in the energy and alertness of the officials at Washington.

In the concluding paragraph of his circular letter, Mr. Sonneck politely says: 'Having a duty to research, wherever originating, it [The Library of Congress] is quite ready, within its capacity, to answer inquiries addressed to it by mail. It would be gratified at any opportunity that you may afford it to be of service to your own investigations.' This is not only excellent in spirit and intent, but shows that the New World fully maintains the courtesy and help-rendering traditions of the staff at our own British Museum Reading-Room.

A PORTRAIT OF MONTEVERDE.

The portrait of Monteverde which forms one of our Special Supplements is from an original painting in the possession of Mr. Arthur F. Hill, and is reproduced by his kind permission. Lady Huggins thus describes this interesting picture: 'The painting represents a young man of about twenty-five; with light-brown hair somewhat curly, a promising moustache, and indications of whiskers and beard. The well-opened brown eyes have a thoughtful, far-away look very characteristic of great musicians; the complexion has a pleasing ruddiness; the mouth is slightly open, as if the musician were in the act of singing. The dress consists of a close-fitting doublet of a dull greenish cloth—probably brighter once. The doublet has a number of small buttons close together down the front, and its short skirt is tabbed. The sleeves are cut close, and have a line of decorative braid down the inner sides. On the shoulders there are epaulet pieces tabbed to match the skirt. The neck of the doublet is cut rather loose, and there folds over a broad, stiff, white collar, rising almost ruff-wise behind, which has evidently been edged with lace-work of an early kind, though unfortunately injudicious cleaning has removed most of it. The cuffs have white ruffles of softer material than the collar.

'... The body of the viol on the wall is obviously that of a sixteenth-century instrument—suggestive of the Brescian School. The sound-holes are vigorous and well-defined, the finger-board has a geometrical (probably) inlaid pattern, and below this is a lozenge-shaped geometrical quatrefoil ornament. The belly is double purfled. The body of the viol-dagamba in the hands of the player is almost wholly hidden by the table: but the pegs are sixteenth-century pegs, except the highest one, which has been badly repainted. It is difficult to feel certain whether the instrument had six or seven strings; apparently (?) it had seven.

'The bows of both viols seem to be of pre-Corelli type, but in neither case can the tip be seen. The music represents the first line of a song apparently in the ut clef. It is written in black and white notes, is unbarred, and has a direct at the end of the line. The hands deserve attention, for undoubtedly they are the hands of a musician, not of a craftsman. The picture is painted rather thinly in oil, on canvas, and measures 2 feet 5 inches by 1 foot 9½ inches.' Lady Huggins also says: 'The costume of the figure is that which was in use among the upper and professional classes in the west of Europe from the latter part of the sixteenth to the earlier part of the seventeenth century.*'

The career of Monteverde (1568-1643) and the important part he played in the evolution of modern music are so well known that it may suffice to quote some words concerning him uttered by the late Sir George Macfarren, who said: 'Claudio Monteverde, a man of the highest note in the history of the art, was the first person who felt the natural basis of music, as distinguished from the artificial rules, which up to the time of his appearance on the scene of history had always prevailed. He it was who first employed what must be called the natural discords—those discords, namely, which, consisting of the notes of the harmonic series, are naturally produced, as distinct from those other discords which can only be satisfactorily heard when their harshness is mitigated by the formula of preparation. These let us call artificial discords; those which Monteverde originated, natural discords. And modern music may be said to date from his first use of the chords in question, the best known of which and the most used is that ever-ready chord of the dominant seventh; and when once the principle of its use was understood, an entirely new field was open in the range of the composer's art, and all time since has been most valuably, most beautifully engaged in the cultivation of this field. And how great, how noble, is the harvest it has yielded! . . . Monteverde, in his originating the overture, in his having a large orchestra, in his intermixture of chorus and solos, in his giving substantial characterisation to each person in his story, indicated, although not in those early days fulfilled, but indicated all that dramatic art can fulfil in music.

* Antonio Stradivari: his life and work (1644-1737). By W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A., and Alfred E. Hill. London: William E. Hill & Sons, 140, New Bond Street. 1902. p. 281.

Church and Organ Music.

SOME NOTES ON THE HARVEST FESTIVAL.

Within the next few weeks churches of all denominations throughout England will be resounding with the voice of thanksgiving for harvest. 'Who "invented" the Harvest Festival?' is a question not easy, if indeed, it is possible, to answer. It may be assumed that this now popular service originated from a desire to sanctify somewhat the village festival known as Harvest-home. This rural function is of great antiquity. Shakespeare—who has garnered almost everything worth knowing—thus refers to it in Part I. of King Henry IV. (Act I, Sc. 4):—

And his chin, new reap'd,
Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home.

As having inaugurated the modern Harvest Festival—that is to say, a musical service held in a church decorated with 'the kindly fruits of the earth'—the names of two clergymen are sometimes mentioned: the Rev. R. S. Hawker, the eccentric vicar of Morwenstowe, Cornwall, and author of 'And shall Trelawny die?' and the redoubtable Archdeacon Denison, vicar of East Brent, Somersetshire. On October 1, 1843, Mr. Hawker—who is said to have been the first to institute the offertory at every service—preluded the Harvest-home rejoicings in his Cornish village with a thanksgiving celebration of the Holy Communion. Archdeacon Denison in a somewhat similar manner also sanctified the Harvest-home. Into all the subsequent jollification of the day, however, he entered very heartily, so much so, indeed, that a motto displayed in the village of East Brent on one of those festive occasions was worded:—

May God pour His benison
On Archdeacon Denison.

We must, however, go back sixty years to find the first appearance of the most popular harvest-hymn in our language, Dean Alford's lines beginning—

Come, ye thankful people, come,
Raise the song of Harvest-home.

Here we find confirmation of the linking-on origin of the Harvest Festival—its close connection with the ancient Harvest-home. It is possible that Dean Alford's hymn was written for the Harvest-home of Wymeswold, near Loughborough, held in 1843, of which village Alford was then vicar, and for this reason: the hymn first appeared in his 'Psalms and Hymns adapted to the Sundays and Holydays throughout the year,' the preface of which is dated 'Wymeswold, April 18, 1844.' There the hymn is headed 'After Harvest.' As editors of Hymnals began to alter its wording—even during the lifetime of the author and without his permission—Dean Alford very justifiably and publicly repudiated the tinkered versions of his jubilant lyric, the authorized (and revised) form of which is to be found in his Poetical Works published in 1865. The fine tune now associated with Dean Alford's words—that known as St. George's, Windsor, by the late Sir George Elvey—was not originally composed to those words, though it fits them like a glove. The tune first appeared in—

A selection of Psalms and Hymns by E. H. THORNE, organist and choir-master of the Parish Church, Henley-on-Thames. 1858.

The 'E. H. Thorne' in the above title is, of course, the well-known organist of St. Anne's, Soho. The tune (No. 62) is there called 'St. George's' only, and is stated to be 'written for this work by Dr. G. J. Elvey.' The notation is two minims in a bar, and the tune is assigned to the hymn 'Hark, the song of Jubilee.' Its happy mating to 'Come, ye thankful people, come,' seems to have been in the first edition of Hymns Ancient and Modern, 1861.

It is interesting to find an Official recognition of the Harvest Festival in the form of 'A General Thanksgiving for the present abundant harvest' ordered by the Queen (Victoria) in Council to be observed on October 1, 1854, during the progress of the Crimean War. At that time decorations began to be in evidence, a modest sheaf of corn, for example, satisfying the villagers of Empingham, near Stamford, half a century ago. Strangely enough nine years later, at a meeting of Convocation held in July, 1863, a letter was read from Sir George Grey, stating that the preparation of a Thanksgiving Service for Harvest by permission of the Queen in Council, as proposed, was of so 'doubtful' a nature that the Lord Chancellor 'thought Her Majesty ought not to be allowed to comply with the application.' How strangely this non possumus reads to-day.

Harvest anthems have multiplied exceedingly during the past fifty years. One of the first—perhaps the first to be published—appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of October 1, 1854, Dr. Greene's setting of 'Thou visitest the earth,' a movement from his anthem 'Thou, O God, art praised in Zion.' One of the earliest of the most favoured of harvest anthems is Goss's 'Fear not, O land,' soon afterwards followed by Barnby's oft-sung 'O Lord, how manifold are Thy works,' which, by the way, made its first appearance in the pages of this journal.

THE NEW METHODIST HYMN-BOOK.

The first book of tunes issued by John Wesley, in 1742, for the use of his followers, was entitled 'A Collection of tunes, set to music, as they are commonly sung at the Foundery,' a title which suggests that some tunes are not musical, which is perfectly true. This little book contained forty-three hymn-tunes, a number in strong contrast to the 863 which constitute the new hymnal.

The composer who has contributed the largest number of tunes to the new hymnal is the Rev. J. B. Dykes, an amateur musician, no fewer than forty tunes bearing his name. Next in order comes Barnby with twenty-eight tunes, Sullivan with twenty-four, Stainer with twenty-two, and Gauntlett with seventeen, while the Editor, Sir Frederick Bridge, contributes twenty-one tunes and twelve arrangements.

The history of Methodist Psalmody has yet to be written; but some interesting notes thereupon are to be found in the Preface to the music edition of the new book. It may be mentioned, however, that the previous collection, issued in 1877, experienced a curious mortality in regard to its musical editors. Dr. Gauntlett was first appointed; at his death George Cooper took up the duties; and at Cooper's departure from this life the services of the late Dr. E. J. Hopkins were secured, and he carried the work through. No such fatality has attended the present Methodist Hymn-Book, the musical editor of which, Sir Frederick Bridge, being very much alive in fulfilling his multifarious engagements.

The usual method has been followed in compiling the music of the Methodist Hymn-Book. A committee selected all the tunes and the organist of Westminster Abbey was engaged to supervise technical matters and offer professional advice to this selective body. The Preface gives the following 'instruction':—

The selection of tunes to be included shall, in the first instance, be made by the Committee, the tunes chosen being submitted to the editor for criticism or alternative suggestion; the final decision, however, will rest with the Committee. For the harmonies and musical interpretation generally the Editor will be responsible.

One would have thought that the 'musical interpretation generally' would devolve upon the organists and choirmasters who will work the book. To what extent representative and experienced organists of Wesleyan chapels served on this Committee no information is given; but no doubt the practical wisdom and advice of such men, most valuable in so important a matter, were sought, even if the fruits thereof are not always evident in these pages.

The new tunes—about ninety in number—are of various degrees of excellence and suitability for congregational song. It does not seem to be easy nowadays to invest the hymn-tune with melody and rhythm, and, at the same time, surround it with the halo of that reverent spirit which should characterize all soul-song compositions. No mere progressions of chords, whether they be archaic in their pedantic tread, or modernly chromatic in their awkward progressions, will atone for that prime essential in the worship-song of the people—a rhythmic melody that shall kindle devotion and uplift the song of the great congregation in a pæan of praise.

In turning to the old tunes we must congratulate the Committee or the Musical Editor, or both, in having restored 'Bedford' to its original triple rhythm: both times the tune appears (Nos. 148 and 928) it is honoured with a foot-note which reads: 'This is the original version.' It would have been well if the same respect had been paid to other tunes—e.g., the melody of Mendelssohn's tune adapted to 'Hark! the herald-angels sing' (No. 122), and the harmonies of Lowell Mason's familiar setting (here called 'Harlan') of 'My faith looks up to Thee.' The children's section—some thirty hymns—seems somewhat inadequate. It might have been improved if more of the tunes of this section had been unencumbered with vocal harmony and printed as a melody with simple chordal accompaniment, as in No. 887, Sullivan's setting of 'Brightly gleams our banner.' The same composer's tune to 'Hushed was the evening hymn,' and Gauntlett's 'Once in royal David's city' are much more effective and natural in their original unisonal forms. Why not retain them?

It was a happy thought to include some of the typical old Methodist tunes, though they, to the number of thirty-nine, are relegated to an Appendix and numbered separately from the remainder. This section is sure to be called upon, not only for the sake of auld lang syne, but when some of the modernities begin to pall, or are found to be congregationally unsingable. The Ancient Hymns and Canticles are pointed for chanting; but Sir Frederick Bridge, in his 'Note' (p. 839) is wrong in stating that the method here adopted—small notes placed above certain words in the recitation—was first introduced 'some twenty years ago.' As a matter of fact the system is at least half-a-century older, it having been suggested, as a practical solution of a difficulty, by Miss Maria Hackett, in the Harmonicon of February, 1832, an account of which we gave in THE MUSICAL TIMES for March, 1903, page 174.

In conclusion, this new hymnal is so large—nearly 1,000 hymns—that it will admirably serve its purpose. In course of time the wheat will become separated from the chaff, and, when the book comes to be revised, the inevitable 'dropping out' will ensue. There is nothing perfect in this world, but in competent hands the merits of the music contained in 'The Methodist Hymn-Book' will be made manifest, and the compilation deserves commendation as the outcome of patient work, serious thought, and earnest endeavour.

Sir Walter Parratt contributed to the August issue of the Sunday Magazine a short article on the new Methodist Hymn-Book. He says:—

Most musical men would be disposed to say of any collection of National melodies that all were good, but that in most books of hymn tunes at least ninety per cent. were poor, feeble things. It must be confessed that hymn writers are often primarily responsible for the meaningless strains to which their words are generally set. Rhythm is the factor in any melody which appeals most forcibly to the man in the street. Few hymns show much correspondence in this matter between their different verses, and the unfortunate composer, in order to fit his melody to the varying accent of the words, must use a dreary sequence of unrhythmic minims.

Sir Walter has composed for the new book a fresh setting of the hymn 'I need Thee every hour,' which he calls 'Tunelet for a Hymnlet.' His Tunelet is named Frogmore.

Sir George Martin has edited and arranged Tallis's Festal Responses and Litany 'as sung at St. Paul's Cathedral,' together with an organ accompaniment to the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed. The Preface contributed thereto by Sir George may be quoted:—

This Edition of Tallis's Preces, Responses and Litany is practically a reprint of that prepared by Dr. Boyce in 1760.

The parts have, however, been rather differently distributed, Dr. Boyce's arrangement being for Treble, two Contra Tenors, Tenor and Bass. In the present Edition the Responses have been arranged for two Trebles, Alto, Tenor and Bass: while the Litany is scored for Treble, Alto, Tenor and two Basses. This distribution of the parts is found to be more resonant, and, what is of greater importance, each voice is being used in the middle part of its compass: consequently the music can be sung quite comfortably at a high or low pitch to suit the voice of the Priest.

The crossing of the two Contra Tenor parts, a device commonly employed by early Church Composers, is now rendered unnecessary.

Dr. Herbert W. Wareing has composed an attractive and somewhat unconventional harvest anthem, in which he has sought, and with much success, to musically illustrate the poetic import of the text rather than to make the words a series of pegs on which to hang a number of musical phrases. The anthem opens with an oboe solo, following which the chorus enters with this gentle strain:—

Allegretto pastorale.

He send-eth the springs in-to the valleys, (Org.) which run a-mong the hills, &c.

To this section succeeds an equally melodious and not difficult duet for soprano and tenor, a felicitous setting of the words 'There shall be as the shaking of the olive tree, and as the gleanings grapes when the vintage is done. For as the earth bringeth forth her bud and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all nations.' A more strenuous section follows, 'Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons and all deeps,' &c., in which excellent effects are produced by some vocal unison passages. A return is then made to the opening section, and the work is brought to a quiet conclusion.

The following is in reply to an inquiry of a correspondent at Burford, Oxfordshire:—

The hymn-tune 'Burford' is doubtless named after the old and historic town from which you write, though there is, as you probably know, another, but smaller, parish in Shropshire similarly named. The history of the tune is as follows: Its first known appearance is in 'A Book of Psalmody, containing a Variety of Tunes for all the Common Metres of the Psalms in the Old and New Versions, and others for Particular Measures, with Chanting Tunes . . . and fourteen Anthems, All set in Four Parts, within such a compass as will most naturally suit the voices in Country Churches, yet may be sung in Three or Two without any Disallowances. By John Chetham. 1718.' The tunes in this long-titled collection are without names—of places and composers. It was published twenty-three years after the death of Purcell, the reputed composer of the tune.

The name 'Burford' appears to have been first bestowed by Nathaniel Gawthorn, in his 'Harmonia Perfecta,' but Purcell is not therein given as the composer. Very little is known of Mr. Nathaniel Gawthorn, except that he was Clerk, or Conductor of Psalmody at the 'Friday Lecture in Eastcheap' (London) early in the eighteenth century. Perchance he was a native of, or had family connections with, Burford, a surmise which research among the Registers there might confirm. The earliest known book in which the name of Purcell is given as the composer is Cotterill's 'Christian Psalmody,' issued in 1831; therefore it took over a hundred years to discover the name of the composer, although the tune had appeared in many eighteenth-century Psalmodies! The weight of evidence is against Purcell's having been the composer. It would be very interesting to be able to state that Purcell received his education at Burford Grammar School, which, as you say, dates from 1571, and thus establish a pleasant connection with the tune hitherto unknown; but this, we fear, is impossible. There is no record that Purcell ever visited Burford, but then the details of his life are not over-abundant in regard to such matters.

Incongruities find their way into church music as they do elsewhere. One of the most curious examples is that contained in a book, issued half-a-century ago, entitled:—

A Collection of Sanctuses, Chants, & Anthems, designed for Private and Congregational use, with appropriate Psalms & Hymns, selected from Dr. Watts, & also passages of the Holy Scripture pointed for chanting.

In this compilation we find that the hymn 'Come, let us join our cheerful songs' is set to a chant concocted from The Dead March in Saul!

The Thirty-first Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on November 17, when the following music will be sung: Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Garrett in F; Wesley's 'The Wilderness'; and 'Worthy is the Lamb' (Handel). The Festival Choir, consisting of about 1,000 voices from Metropolitan Churches, will be under the able direction of Dr. H. Walford Davies, organist of the Temple Church, and Hon. Conductor of the Association, with the efficient help of Mr. F. B. Kiddle at the organ.

SOME FESTIVAL NOVELTIES.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

'THE LOVE THAT CASTETH OUT FEAR.'

Sir Hubert Parry's contribution to the Festival of the Three Choirs is a sacred choral work of meditative character that sets forth the frailty of man and the abiding strength of Divine love. The libretto consists of Biblical texts and some original matter written by the composer. The work is divided into two parts—the first dealing with the Old Testament and the second with the New. Contrast is gained by the juxtaposition of man's questionings of the purpose of life, and Divine compassion and omnipotence. The former are given to the Full chorus, while the answers and suggestions of the Divine messages are given to a hidden Semi chorus; therefore, as will be readily surmised, the spirit of the work is grave, dignified, and solemn. The contrasted sentiments are set forth in the brief instrumental Prologue; man's pessimism and doubt finding expression in the following theme, repeated three times in different keys:—

Ex. 1. Adagio.

and 'The Love that casteth out fear' having its musical analogue in:—

Ex. 2. Adagio.

The portion marked A of the latter example is prominently used, and a jubilant version of it accompanies the words 'All-conquering Love leads nations to great ends,' and the final portion of the last chorus of all. Much use is also made of the section marked B apart from the preceding bars. The Prologue indeed may be styled an epitome of the entire work, and every bar of the instrumental introduction will, in some form or another, be subsequently found. There are several other themes, but their quotation is scarcely necessary as they only exert a comparatively small influence.

The first semi-chorus—introduced in the course of the Instrumental Prologue—begins pianissimo with the words 'O My people, what have I done to thee? wherein have I wearied thee?' and this passage is repeated towards the close of the first part. In a bass solo reference is made to Moses and his failure to reach the promised land, 'Because ye sanctified Me not in the wilderness of Zin in the midst of the children of Israel.' Two full choruses of contrasted sentiment succeed the consideration of the frailty of Moses, and then the ways of David are commented upon in a contralto solo, and the consequences of his backsliding from righteousness are announced by the chorus. The close of the first section is a consideration of the infinite compassion of God, the final words being 'He remembereth we are but dust,' delivered as softly as possible.

The second part opens with a bass solo in which the history of Peter is briefly traced down to his betrayal of the Master. In the latter portion of this section a more dramatic style is adopted, a soprano being employed as narrator of the scene in the outer court. Another soprano utters the words of the accusing maid, Peter's denials being sung in the first person by a bass. On this scene the full chorus moralise at some length, and presently the semi-chorus is also employed, uttering consoling words. This number, which becomes the strongest and most important section of the work, is developed considerably: at the words 'All-conquering Love leads nations to great ends' is commenced the working-up of an imposing climax.

The Epilogue begins with a duet in canon for contralto and bass, thus providing the necessary calm before the preparations for the final chorus 'The spirit shall be poured out upon us.' But the philosophical conception of the work asserts itself at the close, which ends quietly and impressively with the words 'The ways of the Lord are right and the just shall walk in them.'

'THE HOLY INNOCENTS.'

A glance through the score of The Holy Innocents leaves the impression that it is the most important achievement by the gifted organist of Gloucester Cathedral. How greatly composers are dependent on their librettists history abundantly shows, and Mr. Brewer is to be congratulated on having secured the experienced pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, who, in well-varied verse, has cast the tragic story of the slaughter of the Innocents into a form that admirably lends itself to musical treatment in the modern dramatic style. Mr. Brewer has treated the book in this spirit. There is no narrator, each character speaking in the first person, and the choruses consisting of exclamations or expostulations of the people called forth by passing events of which they are spectators or participants. The result is an intensity of expression and realism well calculated to hold the attention, and that can scarcely fail to contribute in measurable degree to the acceptance of the work.

The first notes of the Prologue should be kept in memory, for they form what may be called the Star of Bethlehem theme:—

'THE HOLY INNOCENTS' (continuation).

This theme occurs later in a harmonized form with unmistakable significance. Of greater importance, however, in building up the music is the subject associated with the Holy Babe :—

No. 2.

This is first heard in the orchestra as the Magi ask the people 'Where is the Babe Divine of Jewry born the King?' and as will be surmised it occurs frequently throughout the subsequent pages of the work. The Magi themselves have a graceful subject in triplets, that provides effective contrast to the foregoing. The people treat the Magi as visionaries and dreamers, but warn them that Herod's 'sword is keen and swift.' The treatment of this scene is remarkable for dramatic intuition, and it raises expectation of what is to come.

The second scene is the interior of Herod's palace. The restlessness of the unhappy man is at once suggested by the music, and a strongly accentuated and impetuous descending passage in the bass seems to suggest the evil passions of the tyrant. These are ministered unto by his wife, Malthace, who, although not mentioned in the Gospel, is recognised by history. Herod has been dreaming of the people whom he has removed against their will, and he is despondent and uneasy; but Malthace, whose words are heralded by the theme of the Magi, tells Herod of the search of the wise men for 'a Babe born king of the Jews.' This announcement rouses the king, who says, 'Now am I myself,' which being interpreted by his musical reflection is a very vigorous self indeed :—

No. 3. Maestoso, Marziale.

This theme is developed with a force and ruggedness that admirably suggest the relentless determination of Herod to stamp out all rivals to his throne. His craftiness is set forth in the succeeding section in which he interviews the priests and Magi with regard to the Babe, the solemn announcement of Whose theme brings the scene to a close.

Scene 4 takes us to Bethlehem, and the resting of the star is suggested by the last note of its theme being prolonged and taken up by a tenor soloist with the words—

What meanest thou, O wand'ring star,
Blazing in the heaven afar?

His words are echoed by the people and developed into an effective chorus. Presently the Magi arrive, Mary is found, and in a song, Andantino semplice e dolce, she tells the Magi of her Babe. The placidity of this section forms an admirable contrast to the portrayal of Herod's agony of body and mind and rage when he finds the Magi have discovered the Holy Child but have not returned to him. The fearful order is given, but a gleam of mercy is vouchsafed by Malthace pleading for its recall.

An impressive feature of the final scene is a prayer set to music in seven-part harmony, and intended to be sung unaccompanied. After this the climax of the work is rapidly approached, and in a stirring manner as the people rush to arms to defend their offspring against the soldiers' execution of Herod's command. The cantata closes with an Epilogue, consisting of a setting of a hymn by Bishop Heber, the music opening with a quotation from the Prologue.

'A SONG OF ZION.'

For performance at the opening service of the Festival Mr. John E. West has composed a short choral and orchestral work entitled 'A Song of Zion,' the words selected from Psalm 132, verses 8, 9, 14, 15. The text affords opportunity for variety of treatment, whereof Mr. West has taken full advantage by producing some scholarly and effective music. As the work is one that need not necessarily be restricted to ecclesiastical surroundings, 'A Song of Zion' would form an interesting subject for study by choral societies.

'AWAKE, MY SOUL, AND COME AWAY.'

Mr. C. Lee Williams, a former organist of Gloucester Cathedral, contributes a festival hymn for chorus and organ (ad lib.). The words are taken from the Festival Hymns of Jeremy Taylor. The music, written in a capella style, is characterized by stately progressions and dignified expression, reverent strains which admirably illustrate the text of the old hymn written by the seventeenth-century divine.

CARDIFF MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

'JOHN GILPIN.'

The humour of Dr. Cowen finds a natural outlet in his setting of Cowper's immortal poem 'John Gilpin,' with the result that the work will most certainly exert an enlivening influence upon the Cardiff Festival. The setting of the opening lines—

John Gilpin was a citizen Of credit and renown

at once shows, by its direct and robust expression, that the composer has caught the true spirit of the text, and as the music proceeds it amusingly accentuates the self-importance of 'the knight of the stone jar,' as Cowper designates the hero of the famous ride. But Mr. Gilpin is courteous withal, and when he tells his spouse she is his 'dearest dear,' the music reflects the citizen's tender-hearted gallantry. In the setting of the lines—

Yet loss of pence, full well he knew,
Would trouble him much more,

the music imparts added humour by its confidential tone and significant harmonic transitions.

Dr. Cowen begins the ride with a reiteration of the following bass figure :—

No. 1. Molto moderato, p ma poco marcato.

and to this Gilpin trots along in dignity for twenty bars; but after this the 'snorting beast' increases his pace until it becomes a gallop, and, with a change of rhythmic movement, the worthy horseman's troubles begin. Even Hanslick admitted that music could express motion definitely, and no one can deny that the potentialities in the figure—are great, as poor Gilpin himself soon discovers. In one long, agonising crescendo he is carried past the inn where he fain would stop, a sly and subtle touch of humour being the sprightly announcement by the orchestra of the gastronomic ditty 'The Roast Beef of old England,' as his wife and family shout 'The dinner waits!' A snatch of this melody is also heard as the equestrian citizen declines the Calender's invitation to dine with him at Edmonton. The suggestion of the strokes with which Gilpin urges his steed to carry him back to Ware also heightens the merriment of the work. Other comic touches supplied by the orchestra are the imitations of the 'braying ass' and the consequent snort of Gilpin's affrighted steed, with which the unfortunate horseman is once more carried away against his will sans cloak, sans hat, sans wig, pursued by all who could join in the wild ride.

Not one of them was mute
And all and each of them that pass'd
Did join in the pursuit.

A 'WELSH RHAPSODY' FOR ORCHESTRA.

In his 'Welsh Rhapsody' (for orchestra) Mr. Edward German has struck a patriotic note—or to be more accurate, a number of patriotic notes—which will appeal with no uncertain sound to the native pride and emotional feelings of the Welsh people. The folk-tunes he has selected are 'Loudly proclaim,' 'Hunting of the Hare,' 'Bells of Aberdovey,' 'David of the White Rock,' and—need it be said?—'March of the Men of Harlech.' The composer treads upon sure ground with such potential thematic material at his disposal, but when thereto is added piquant and pellucid orchestration—of which Mr. German is so clever an adept—the success of this 'Welsh Rhapsody' may be assured, not only at Cardiff, but in places beyond the Principality.

'THE VICTORY OF ST. GARMON.'

Mr. Harry Evans has composed a cantata entitled 'The Victory of St. Garmon,' set for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra. The libretto, by Mr. H. Elvet Lewis, deals with a Welsh war scene known as the Alleluia battle, supposed to have been fought in the fifth century, near Mold. The opposing forces were the Picts, who had invaded the country, and the native army, led by Garmon. The fight took place in Easter week and the river Alun was in flood. A monument at Maersgarmon marks the spot of the conflict. The subject is one that naturally lends itself to dramatic treatment. As to the extent to which Mr. Harry Evans has embraced his opportunity we must defer judgment till the work is performed at Cardiff.

The band of the Grenadier Guards left Liverpool in the Cunard liner Ivernion on August 16 for Boston, en route to the St. Louis Exhibition, where the red-coated and busby-crowned musicians will worthily uphold the best traditions of English military music under the conductorship of Lieut. A. Williams, the Bandmaster of the famous regiment.

Obituary.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

The death of Professor EDUARD HANSLICK, the eminent Viennese musical critic, took place at Baden, near Vienna, on August 6. Born at Prague, September 11, 1825, he had nearly completed his seventy-ninth year at the time of his demise. He studied law, taking his Doctor's degree in 1849, and qualified for an official position; but he forsook the legal vocation when he adopted a literary-musical career. As a young man Hanslick had studied music under Tomaschek, and he had become an excellent pianist before he began his life-work as a musical critic and writer upon music. His first journalistic work is to be found in the columns of the Wiener Zeitung of 1848 and 1849. For nine years (1855-1864) he was musical editor of the Presse, and subsequently he served on the staff of the Neue freie Presse.

He became tutor of aesthetics and musical history at the University of Vienna in 1856, professor extraordinary in 1861, and, in 1870, full professor. He retired from this post in 1895, being succeeded by Dr. Guido Adler. Hanslick officiated as juror at the Great Exhibitions held at Paris in 1867 and 1878, and at Vienna in 1873. In 1876 he was appointed a member of the Imperial Council of Austria, having previously received the order of the Iron Cross; in 1886 the title of K. K. Hofrat was conferred upon him. Although a strong opponent of Wagner and his art theories and a strenuous conservative in music, Hanslick was not only an early supporter of Schumann but a strong adherent of Brahms.

Hanslick achieved wide fame by his book 'Vom Musikalisch-Schönen. Ein Beitrag zur Revision der Aesthetik der Tonkunst,' known in England by the title 'The Beautiful in Music' (Novello), the only one of his works which has been translated into our vernacular. In this thoughtfully-written and logically conceived treatise Hanslick maintains that the beauty of a musical composition lies in the music itself—the strains thereof per se—and that whatever charm it possesses is entirely free from extraneous, or non-musical ideas. This is a doctrine that does not admit of general acceptance, but the book is one of great importance in the consideration of the modern aesthetics of music, and as such it can be perused with profit by true lovers of music. The remainder of Hanslick's publications—some of which are reprints of his journalistic industry—include: Geschichte des Concertwesens in Wien (1869); Aus dem Konzertsaal (1870); Die moderne Oper (1875, &c.); Musikalische Stationen (1880); Aus dem Opernleben der Gegenwart (3rd edn., 1885); Suite: Aufsätze über Musik und Musiker (1885); Concerte, Componisten und Virtuosen der letzten fünfzehn Jahre (1886); Musikalisches Skizzenbuch (1888); Musikalisches und Litterarisches (1889); Aus dem Tagebuche eines Musikers (1892); Aus meinem Leben (1894); Fünf Jahre Musik (1896); 'Am Ende des Jahrhunderts, 1895-1899' (1899); 'Aus neuer und neuester Zeit' (1900). He also contributed the text to the illustrated works Galerie deutscher Tondichter (1873), and Galerie französischer und italienischer Tondichter (1874).

The death of Mr. JOHN MORE SMIETON, we regret to place on record, occurred at his residence, Broughty Ferry, on July 13, after a long illness. Born at Dundee in 1857, Mr. Smioton had a passionate love of music. Before he had reached the age of ten he composed several songs and pianoforte pieces, and, moreover, he produced a cantata entitled 'Pearl.' He studied music under the late Sir Herbert Oakeley, Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. Frederic H. Cowen, and Mr. George Henschel. Although the claims of his extensive business—he and his family have been long and honourably connected with the jute trade—made large demands upon his time and energies, the divine art was ever his recreative, and, indeed, creative delight.

In collaboration with his poet-brother, Mr. James Smioton, as librettist, he composed and successfully produced several meritorious choral works which have attained popularity in Scotland and elsewhere. These fraternal joint-creations are three in number—'Ariadne' (produced in April, 1884), 'King Arthur' (December, 1899), and 'Connla' (February, 1900). In addition to the foregoing Mr. Smioton composed a setting of Psalm 121, for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra (a product of his Edinburgh University days); an Orchestral Overture; a String Quartet; a setting for chorus and organ of William Cullen Bryant's 'Song of the sower'; a spirited setting of Burns's 'Jolly beggars'; songs, part-songs, anthems, pianoforte pieces, &c.

Mr. Smieton was not only an amateur musician of cultured mind and high attainments, but he occupied a distinguished place among contemporary Scottish composers. His premature death, at the age of forty-six, is greatly to be regretted, and for his family much sympathy has naturally been expressed.

Pathetic, indeed, were the circumstances connected with the death of Mr. ARTHUR CARNALL, which, we regret to say, took place at Penge on June 30, at the age of fifty-two. Born on May 7, 1852, at Peterborough, he became a chorister in the Cathedral. From there he went to the neighbouring city of Ely on becoming an articled pupil of and assistant to the late Dr. Chipp. He graduated Mus. B. at Cambridge in 1872, and early in the following year, at the age of twenty, obtained the organistship of St. John's Church, Penge, where for thirty-one years he has most conscientiously discharged the duties of his office. His fatal illness was so short, only a few days, that he literally died in harness, to the great grief of those who were associated with him. A high-minded man of singularly pure motives and charm of demeanour, Arthur Carnall was greatly beloved. He devoted himself to his widowed mother with a rare strength of affection, and after her death, eight months ago, to his invalid brother, George, who, sad to say, survived him only one week. George Carnall, formerly a chorister at Peterborough Cathedral under Dr. Keeton, held the post of organist and choirmaster of Monmouth Grammar School until three years ago, when ill-health compelled him to retire.

Mr. Arthur Carnall gave proof of his creative gifts in an Orchestral Overture, two Quintets (in D and F) for wind instruments, two String Quartets (in C minor and F), a Nocturne for strings, in addition to glees, madrigals, part-songs, anthems, organ and violin pieces, songs, &c. Sadly prophetic was his last composition (unfinished), it being a setting of the words 'I will lay me down in peace and sleep.' To Miss Kate Carnall, the sister of the two brothers who were so highly esteemed during their life-time, we join with others in offering sincere sympathy in her double bereavement.

We regret to record the death of Mr. CHARLES ALFRED ORANGE, which took place, at the age of fifty-nine, on August 2. Mr. Orange, who had been in the employment of Messrs. Novello for the long period of about thirty-six years, was foreman of the staff who set up the type of THE MUSICAL TIMES month by month. He will be remembered by all engaged in the preparation of this journal—editor and composers alike—as a man of kindly nature and unfailing courtesy in the discharge of the responsible duties committed to his care.

Mr. Watkin Mills has made quite a triumphant progress during his 'round the world tour.' At the Town Hall, Sydney, in June last, he gave, with much success, three recitals, assisted by M. Eduard Parlovitz, a young Pole, as solo pianist. The extensive repertoire of Mr. Watkin Mills furnishes him with every opportunity for diversity of interpretative gifts, of which the well-known basso fully avails himself to the delight of his audiences.

Mr. Ernest Newton has recently organized a new Institution called the London School of Pianoforte Accompaniment, located at 126, Oxford Street, W. The scope of the instruction given thereat includes: How to accompany songs and violin and violoncello solos; how to read accompaniments at sight; how to transpose accompaniments; and even how to compose accompaniments!

Messrs. Morris and Co., 392, Strand, send us a portrait of Sir George Martin, drawn from life by Mr. Sidney Kent. It is an excellent likeness of the esteemed organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.

Reviews.

A Method of Teaching Harmony based upon Systematic Ear-training, &c. By Frederick G. Shinn. Part I. Diatonic Harmony.

[The Vincent Music Company, Limited.]

This is the first instalment of a commendable endeavour to make the study of harmony real instead of what it only too often is—one of the greatest educational shams of the day. Dr. Shinn rightly insists that ear-training—not merely eye-training and rule-remembering—is the only rational basis of the study of harmony. It is possible to sympathise heartily with this view, and at the same time to recognise the practical difficulty in the way of carrying out such a scheme. In the first place there is the lugubrious fact that probably not one in ten of the so-called harmony students (or ought we to say examinees?) on which examining bodies and teachers live, move, and have their being, could be expected to pursue the study on the ear-training plan with any chance of success. Experience proves that unless potential examinees have a good deal more than average capacity, progress, strictly regulated by the power to inwardly hear chords and chordal progression, is depressingly slow. All the same, if in their harmony examinations our examining bodies were to insist upon facility in telling chords by ear, such a self-denying ordinance would be a great stimulus to intelligent study, and the gain to students with fair capacity would more than balance the elimination of those to whom the study can never be profitable.

We have not space to examine Dr. Shinn's plans in detail. It must be enough to state that the commonest chords are introduced step by step in their most usual surroundings, if not in the order of their most frequent use. Dr. Shinn girds at the inutilty of figured basses compared with exercises which force the student to think out progressions for himself. This may be conceded, but on the other hand it may be said that the filling-in of figured basses does at least provide a useful basis for the practise of part-writing. Even our author is forced to use the figures rather liberally. In fact the nomenclature derived from the figures (chord of the sixth, &c.) is distinctly useful, although it fails to register tonal or key relation. It is noticeable that Dr. Shinn makes little or no attempt to characterize the effects of chords from the tonal aspect. Yet the method adopted makes constant demands upon a student's sensibility to the mental effect of tonal relationship.

In view of the convenience of a terse nomenclature of chords, and especially of chord relations, in teaching harmony by ear-training, we rather wonder that Dr. Shinn with his iconoclastic and reforming zeal has not adopted some less clumsy expressions than 'second inversion of the subdominant,' &c., for the purpose of writing down chords. The clear and brief naming of chords and their inversions invented by Godfrey Weber (whose admirable work on harmony was published about 1820)—and used with modifications by the late John Curwen (whose interesting works on harmony based on ear-training seem to have escaped the attention of Dr. Shinn), and also by Professor Prout—come to our mind in this connection. Dr. Shinn's very carefully written book presents many other points for discussion upon which we cannot touch. We must be content to recommend the work without reservation to the attention of students and teachers of harmony.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

It was a bold venture to begin the Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall so early in August as the sixth evening of the month, but although the attendances have greatly varied in number, on the whole results have justified the step taken by the management. On the opening night the hall was crowded to its fullest capacity, and interest was increased by a certain curiosity concerning the abilities of the newly formed orchestra. Speaking generally Mr. Henry J. Wood has a fine body of instrumentalists at his command, but however capable individually the players of a band may be, a considerable time must elapse before the higher excellences and delicate subtleties of orchestral playing can be attained. That the band has an exceptional opportunity in the present series of concerts is obvious, and the interpretations of certain works on which Mr. Wood has lavished special care at rehearsal show that a very high standard may be expected in the future.

One of the most pleasing of the novelties is Mr. Stewart Macpherson's Concerto for Violin, performed on August 9. This is not an ambitious work, but it is sincere, melodious, and well-written music that is always acceptable; and, as the solo part was sympathetically played by Mr. Spencer Dyke, the Concerto had a most cordial reception, composer and executant being called to the platform amid hearty applause.

On the Tchaikovsky night (August 16) there was performed, for the first time in London, the Intermezzo called 'The Battle of Poltava' from the Russian composer's opera 'Mazeppa,' which we understand was given in the provinces some years ago. 'Poltava' is the name of Poushkin's poem on which the opera is founded, and the Intermezzo is further described as a 'Symphonic Picture.' In the opera it comes before the final scene, and just after the heroine has seen her father executed by the order of her fickle lover, Mazeppa. The Intermezzo is an attempt to suggest in sound a battle, and musically it is built up with three themes, a national song 'Slavias' (Glory), a fragment of a hymn-tune of the Greek Church (of which use is made at the opening of the '1812' Overture), and a march tune of the period of Peter the Great. In character the work is conceived in the spirit of the '1812' Overture, and although sensitive ears may prefer to be in the corridor of the hall during its performance, there is little doubt that the 'battle' will be often heard at Queen's Hall. On the same evening a very successful appearance was made by Mr. Robert Burnett, a baritone who has acquired a considerable reputation in Scotland, which he bids fair to augment in London.

On August 18 a Romance for orchestra entitled 'The Festival of Pan' (Op. 9), by Mr. F. S. Converse, was heard for the first time in England. Mr. Converse is an American composer, having been born at Newton (Mass.) in 1871, and is at present a resident of Boston. His works are practically unknown in this country, but they include an Overture, a Violin Concerto, and a considerable quantity of chamber music. The Romance—one of three based upon Keats's 'Endymion'—is fluently written and sonorously and elaborately scored, but its indebtedness to Wagner is so great that it can only be regarded as a clever imitation of the master's methods. Mention is due of Mr. S. L. Wertheim's brilliant rendering of the solo part of Hubay's little-known Viola Concerto. Mr. Wertheim, who comes from Paris, is principal viola of the Queen's Hall orchestra, and on this occasion he made his début in England as a soloist.

Two other novelties merit record, although neither proved very interesting. The first of these is a Prelude entitled 'L'Après-Midi d'un Faune,' by M. Claude Debussy, a French composer who has recently attracted much attention in Paris by his operas, notably 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' owing to the 'advanced' character of the music. The Prelude was introduced on August 20. The other novelty, performed on August 23, is by Herr Fritz Volbach, conductor of the Municipal Orchestra, Mayence. It is an ambitious work entitled 'Alt Heidelberg, du Feine' (Op. 29), and is an attempt to suggest orchestrally the exuberant influence of Spring. Herr Volbach has written lavishly and fluently for a large number of instruments, including a celesta, and there is an almost continual flow of rich, sonorous sounds.

M. A. B.—(1) You will find some useful hints in regard to octave playing in two books by Mr. Franklin Taylor, 'Primer of Pianoforte Playing' (Macmillan) and 'Technique and Expression in Pianoforte Playing' (Novello). The octaves in Chopin's Polonaise in A flat (Op. 53) are doubtless exacting to anyone with a weak wrist; but they do not extend to quite two pages of the music without a break, as after fifteen bars there is a change of figure for five bars before the octaves are resumed for the remaining fifteen bars. Perhaps you practise octave passages for too long at a time, instead of adopting the 'short and frequent' method. Do not be discouraged—Perseverantia omnia vincit. (2) The special portraits which appear in THE MUSICAL TIMES are not sold separately from the journal itself. The publishers will tell you if the back numbers you require are procurable.

H. G.—(1) Full and authentic particulars concerning the so-called 'Handel's organ at Edgware' will be found in an article by Dr. W. H. Cummings, entitled 'Handel Myths,' which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of January, 1885, together with letters on the subject in the issues of the two following months. (2) The music performed at Beethoven's funeral has been arranged by Vincent Novello, which, with an account of the obsequies, is published by Messrs. Novello. (3) The Shepherd's Song and Evening Hymn by Merkel are not published separately, but in the Organ Album of that composer.

N. C. M.—It is perhaps more difficult to obtain music pupils in London or its suburbs than in less crowded and more localised districts. Your Professional Diploma should help you if you can only make known its practical outcome. You might with possible advantage give a pianoforte recital, to which you would invite all and sundry of your friends and acquaintances, in addition to playing in public as often as possible—in fact, by making yourself known and, in course of time, sought after.

H. J.—For books on organ construction consult: 'A practical treatise on organ-building,' by F. E. Robertson (Sampson Low); 'Practical organ-building,' by W. E. Dickson, M.A. (Crosby, Lockwood and Son); 'Organs and tuning,' by Thomas Elliston (Weekes and Co.); in addition to John Hiles's 'Catechism of the organ,' a useful little book.

R. H. F.—For some descriptive pieces—after the style of 'The Storm'—composed for the Harmonium, see Souvenir de Lucerne, a fantasy pastorale and tempest in the Alps, by F. Breitenbach; Scène Espagnole (Impression de Voyage), by A. Le Beau; Six pieces (various), Op. 29, by Salomé; and Guilmant's 'L'Organiste pratique' (12 books).

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—We regret not to be able to give you any particulars of the Polish violinist, Leop. Premyslav. No charge is made for 'Answers to Correspondents'; we are always glad to be of use to our readers in this respect, preference being given to matters of general interest.

G. F. A. N.—The following pieces for two violoncellos with pianoforte accompaniment may suit you: Reverie, by R. de Boisdeffre; Duettino concertante, by E. Grell; and Theme and variations (Op. 29), by Thieriot.

NONA.—Try Mrs. Curwen's 'The Child Pianist,' a method that is admirable for the intelligent training of even very young children in pianoforte playing.

G. S. M.—Thanks for your note of appreciation. We quite intend to continue issuing Sir George Grove's analyses, and your Mozart request shall receive due attention.

E. A. C.—No arrangement for the organ of Rubinstein's 'The Russian Patrol' can be traced, but no inquiries have been made at Port Arthur.

J. A.—The history of 'Ride a cock horse to Banbury Cross' is as mysterious as that of a Banbury cake.

V. L.—The music paper you require—'for pianoforte trio work'—is only ruled to order.

W. B. W.—'A Russian School of Music in London'! This we wot not of.

BASSO.—Probably yes. Address care of Mr. Vert, Cork Street, Bond Street.

OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC

EDITED BY

JOHN E. WEST.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The Organ Music of the older English composers has for some years been much neglected, owing chiefly to its slight texture and the antiquated character of its registering, which make a literal performance of it unsuited to organs of the present day.

Some of it, however, is too good to be allowed to fall into oblivion.
The character of its general outline is in no way destroyed by a judicious modification of details to suit modern requirements.

Probably some of the "filling in" which the thinness of certain passages now seems to demand was actually intended in performance.

The object of the present series is to provide a selection of the best of these pieces, adapted only so far as necessary to make them practicable and effective on modern organs. J. W.

THE

PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Is well ahead of all Mr. Gaul's previous efforts. . . . Special mention may be made of the treatment of the parable of the Prodigal Son, which occupies a conspicuous place."—Daily Star.

"The Victoria Hall, Hanley, was well filled by an audience who gave enthusiastic evidence of their approval of Mr. Gaul's music. The chorus and band numbered 350 performers. . . . A striking feature in the form of a delightfully instrumented Eastern dance in itself is sufficient to enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation."—STAFFORDSHIRE CORRESPONDENT, The Musical Times.

"Judged by the appreciative reception accorded it by the crowded audience at Griffithstown, it bids fair to eclipse the popularity of the same composer's 'Holy City.' . . . 'The Prince of Peace' is a work of an exceptionally high order. There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. The work is varied and interesting, and, like all of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, supplies a need which no other composer of music so satisfactorily meets, viz., a moderately difficult work written on classical lines. . . . The cantata occupied about ninety minutes, and from the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment. . . . Already we understand numerous requests have been made for an early repetition."—Pontypool Free Press.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Thou art the King of Glory," a singularly fine chorus, worthy of any composer, living or dead. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm. This cantata, which completes the octave of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, we hold to be the best. If it prove less popular than the composer's 'The Holy City,' we shall be surprised. Mr. Gaul was engaged on this, his latest work, for about three years, and we believe that all who hear it will agree that the time was very profitably spent."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"In every way worthy the great reputation and experience of its composer. . . . Is indeed a work of a very unusual character, and most probably destined to become more popular than any of his other compositions. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

PRESS NOTICES.

THE TIMES.

A work no less effective and graceful than the Suite given at the Philharmonic. The opening movement, a "Stately Dance," is exceedingly characteristic and original; the second, a "Rustic Dance," has, among prominent parts for wood-wind instruments, a delightful flourish for oboe; the succeeding "Graceful Dance," though a good deal like several other compositions of Mr. Cowen, prepares well for the final "Country Dance," a most attractive measure.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

These pieces, written for the most part "in the old style," are agreeable examples of a composer who is never at fault when he sets himself to charm by simple and graceful means. Orchestral societies desiring to cultivate works that are not too heavily strewn with stumbling-blocks cannot do better than make the acquaintance of this pleasing little Suite.

STANDARD.

They are respectively named "Stately Dance," "Rustic Dance," "Graceful Dance" and "Country Dance," names which well describe their several characters. As may be imagined, they are all scored in a most picturesque manner. They were excellently played under the direction of the composer, and the double recall he received to the platform testified to the pleasure his work had afforded the audience.

DAILY NEWS.

These brief, but highly effective, pieces avowedly imitate the old style, and they are entitled respectively a "Stately Dance," a "Rustic Dance"—very quaint and pretty, and not without its traces of humour—a "Graceful" and a "Country Dance." The composer, who conducted, was recalled to the platform, and his new Suite will, beyond much question, be heard of again.

MORNING POST.

These are attractive imitations of the forms in which our forefathers took delight. They are all most effectively scored, and are of that graceful and refined character which is expected in works by this gifted writer. They were warmly received, and doubtless will be often heard at the concerts of amateur orchestral societies, for which they are very suitable.

GLOBE.

Four charming English Dances in the old style, by Mr. Cowen, were performed for the first time, and achieved an undoubted success.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Pianists will like the "Four English Dances," by F. H. Cowen, published by Novello, Ewer and Co. They are not too difficult, and make very acceptable pieces for the drawing-room.

MORNING.

They will doubtless be played again and again by our bands during the summer. The music appeals strongly to the popular taste.

BRITISH MUSICIAN.

Any ordinary listener will be pleased, while the accomplished musician will be delighted. The "Graceful Dance" is charmingly simple and promises to become as popular as Mr. Edward German's well-known "Shepherds' Dance." The other numbers are very fine.

QUEEN.

Produce an admirable effect. The Dances are respectively, a well-named "Stately Dance" in A minor, a characteristic "Rustic Dance" in B flat, a really "Graceful Dance" in G, and, best of all, a capital "Country Dance" in A minor and major, which is replete with quaint humour and characteristic spirit.

MANCHESTER COURIER.

Orchestral societies cannot do better than include in their repertory this little Suite, and a special word of commendation may be accorded to the second number, the "Rustic Dance," which abounds with prominent parts for the wood-wind. Pianoforte amateurs will also be charmed with the arrangement made on their behalf by the composer.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

This quaint and beautiful Suite, arranged from the orchestral score, is conceived in the composer's happiest manner, and will be found a novel and attractive series of pieces either for the drawing-room or as refined and excellent practice for the school room. The "Stately Dance" is extremely sparkling, the "Rustic Dance" is charming, the "Graceful Dance" is very Cowenesque, which is high praise, and the "Country Dance" is an excellent finale.

GLOUCESTER JOURNAL.

Will be most acceptable to the public in their present form. They are essentially in "the olden style," and are conspicuous for the grace and elegance that distinguish all Mr. Cowen's orchestral compositions.

BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

The pieces are of such charm and interest that in their compressed form they cannot fail to arrest attention and to please. The charming little Suite consists of a characteristic "Stately Dance," a quaint "Rustic Dance," a suave and pretty "Graceful Dance," and a striking "Country Dance." We heartily commend them to pianists.—Four English Dances, in the olden style, composed by F. H. Cowen, have also been arranged for the same instruments by Berthold Tours. They are delightful pieces, full of grace and beauty.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" will consist of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this Section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on.

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. od.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. od.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. od.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions) ..	2s. 6d.

PIECES.

In completion of the scheme of "A Modern School" a large number of Pieces will be published, in a form designed to fulfil the requirements of Violin Teachers and Students. In each number the Violin part will be furnished with complete Fingerings and Bowings, besides remarks as to the methods of rendering, &c.

PREFACE.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason, the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern, so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The lack of certain well-known hymns in that book and the need of extra hymns for certain occasions are often felt. This is clear from the fact that many supplemental appendixes and leaflets are now used with it, particularly books for mission services, children's use, and other special occasions.

It may be said by many that we already have too many hymns, and that a large number are most unsuitable. There is no subject upon which persons differ more thoroughly than the suitability of different hymns. No two people will ever agree as to all the hymns in any collection. The only way of dealing satisfactorily with this problem seems to be to give a comprehensive compilation, together with guidance as to the character of each hymn. Hence, in the index of first lines a letter has been prefixed to each hymn giving an indication as to its characteristic—whether a hymn of direct praise, a prayer, or sentimental, historical, etc., etc. Those who object to hymns of any particular class can, therefore, easily avoid their use.

Guided by these two principles, hymns have been included for the following reasons:—

1. Hymns which, being in constant request, are inserted, not necessarily because of their merit, but rather because they have been found to be of real use in many cases.

2. Since the formation of other hymn books, much greater prominence has been given to music in connection with Choral Celebrations, and with this has grown a want of more hymns, especially short ones of one or two verses for different parts of the service.

3. So also has there grown a demand for further hymns on Almshousing, for Processionals of a greater length than usual, for Harvest, Flower, and Mission Services, besides other special occasions.

4. Finally, it is felt by very many to be a mistake to accustom children to the use of a Children's hymn book which will be discarded when they have grown older. Far better is it to accustom them at once, when young, to love the hymn book which they will use in after life. For this purpose a few more children's hymns than are supplied in other books seem to be wanted.

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

ERNEST J. BREMNER
PRIZE SONATINA

ERNEST J. BREMNER, the winner of our Prize Sonatina Competition was born at Bristol on November 6th, 1868, the son of an English father and a German mother. When he was but eighteen months old his parents took up their residence in Germany. By a singular coincidence young Bremner spent his childhood in Endenich bei-Bonn, in the very house in which Robert Schumann died. After completing his course of study at the Gymnasium at Moers on the Rhine, and at Bonn, he entered the Conservatoire at Cologne under the tuition of such renowned professors as Max Pauer (pianoforte), Arnold Mendelssohn and Bartmuss (organ), Jensen (counterpoint), and Franz Wüllner (composition). He passed his examination in 1891, and became teacher of music and conductor of the Men's Choral Society at Siegen, and in 1893 was appointed organist and choir master at "Unserer lieben Frauen-Kirche" at Bremen, a position which he still holds.

The Sonatina, which gained the prize in our recent competition, is now published.

Price 1s. 6d.

THE MUSICAL LIBRARY OF MR. T. W. TAPHOUSE, M.A.

Oxford is famous for its libraries. They are known, if not read, by all men. To the musical bibliophile the Bodleian is a veritable Mecca, and the fine collection at Christ Church rejoices the heart of the student.* The tome treasures in other College libraries add to the vast field of bibliographical fruition at this ancient seat of learning. But these precious collections are not creations of yesterday. Carefully nurtured by succeeding generations of book-lovers, these libraries, found very much at home among his beloved books—his 2,000 companions—and surrounded by his old musical instruments.

‘How did you begin to collect music and musical literature?’ we ask Mr. Taphouse. ‘I began,’ he replies, ‘in about the year 1858, and I was very fortunate in the first few purchases I made—for example, I picked up a third edition of the “Dancing Master” at a bookstall at Bath for sixpence.’ ‘Just the price of three Bath buns,’ we venture somewhat enviously to interpose. ‘And I bought Morley’s Plaine and Easie Introduction (1597) for fifteen shillings,’ adds Mr. Taphouse, ‘and Mace’s Musick’s Monument (1676), with the portrait, for twenty-five shillings. I have since visited many of the principal towns in England in search of old music books, and have attended the auction sales of the musical libraries of Joseph Warren, Dr. Crotch, Dr. Rimbault,

The Dancing-Master :

The 7th Edition, with Addition of several new Dances, and Tunes of Dances, never before printed.

like the world-famed lawns in those delightful gardens, are the growth of centuries. No connection can therefore be made between these
ret. storehouses and those built up, so to speak, by private individuals. But there are two private collections in Oxford which make a good ‘second’ in regard to music and its literature—that made by the late Sir John Stainer (exceedingly rich in song-books), and that which forms the subject of the present article. The former may serve for future treatment in this series of chit-chats on musical libraries; in the meantime the reader is invited to take a peep into the modest room, with its pleasant outlook down Broad Street, Oxford, where genial Mr. Councillor Taphouse may be

Sir Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Julian Marshall, and many others. On these bidding occasions I have met in friendly conflict for the possession of a rare book many well-known collectors, such as the late William Chappell, Mr. Alfred Littleton, Dr. W. H.
Cummings, Mr. J. E. Matthew, and the late Julian Marshall, but only on a few occasions did I come off the conqueror. Therefore I have had mainly to rely upon my efforts in out-of-the-way districts in order to obtain my rarest books.
I received much encouragement from the late Sir Frederick Ouseley and Sir John Stainer, —now alas! no more—both of whom I may count among my valued friends of former days.
Sir Walter Parratt, too, when he was organist of Magdalen, also urged me to go on with my hobby, and thus the collection which you see gradually grew.’

* Illustrated articles on the Bodleian Library, and on Christ Church, Oxford, appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November, 1902, and August, 1902, respectively.

As an old citizen of Oxford, Mr. Taphouse naturally takes special interest in an Oxford printed book which he hands us for perusal. Here is its title-page in exact facsimile :

THE PRAISE OF MUSICK:

Wherein besides the antiquitie, dignitie, delectation, & vse thereof in ciuill matters, is also declared the sober and lawfull vse of the same in the congregation and Church of God.

Hieron in Psal. 64.

Matutinis Vespertinisque hymnis Ecclesiæ delectatur Deus, per animam fidelem, quæ relictò inanum superstitionum ritu, eum deuotè laudauerit.

God is delighted with the morning & evening hymns of the church, in a faithfull soul, which reie-cting the ceremonies of vaine superstition, prauiſeth him deuoudly.

Printed at Oxenford by JOSEPH BARNES
Printer to the-Vniuersitie, Anno 1586.

Although this little book is anonymous, its author is Dr. John Case, a celebrated writer on Aristotle. Born at Woodstock, he was an Oxford chorister, first at New College and afterwards at Christ Church. He subsequently gained a scholarship at St. John's College (in 1564), took his M.A. degree, became M.D. in 1589 and a Canon of Salisbury in the same year. On January 23, 1600, he died, and was buried in St. John's College, where, during his lifetime, he was 'the most noted disputant and philosopher that ever before set foot in the College.' His 'Speculum Moraliū' (1585) was the first book printed at the press presented to Oxford by its Chancellor, the Earl of Leicester. The 'Praise of Musicke,' a black-letter 12mo book of 152 pages, is dedicated by the printer 'To the Right Worshipful Sir Walter Rawley (Raleigh), Knight': he subscribes himself 'From Oxenford, your worship's most humble at commandement, Ioseph Barnes': and calls the book 'an Orphan of one of Lady Musicke's children.' The opening sentences of Dr. John Case's 'The Preface to the Reader' deserve quotation for their quaintness :

True it is, which is reported of poets and musitions, that they are no otherwise affected toward their own devices, than parents toward their children. And surely (gentle reader), I willingly confesse unto thee, that I am glad I have some skill in musicke, which is so sweete, so good, so vertuous, so comely a matrone among other artes. Wherefore I shal not justly blame thee if thou think that love and affection hath prevailed much with me in publishing of this pamphlet : for therein thou shalt give testimonie unto me, that I have performed the part of a kinde and gratefull sonne, in bestowing the best of mine abilitie to the advancing of so gracious a mother. Neither would I have thee so much to stand upon this conceit, as if reason had no place in this action : considering that affection without reason is a blind and unjust judge of any matter. May it therefore please thee, no otherwise to judge of my labour than the reasons therein alleaged shall give thee just occasion : and if it happen thou come to the viewe hereof with a prejudice, yet consider that nature hath therfore given thee two eares, that thou shouldst as well applie the one to the defendent, as the other to the plaintife.

Mr. Taphouse possesses a copy of the earliest known Dictionary of Musical Terms published in England. This 'wee boke' (5 by 3 inches in size) preceded by sixteen years a similar work issued by Grassineau in 1740, one that is usually stated to have been the first of its kind in this country. The little volume of ninety-six pages is entitled :

A short | EXPLICATION | of such | Foreign Words, | as are made use of in | MUSICK BOOKS.

London, | Printed for J. Brotherton, | at the Bible in Cornhill, near | the Royal Exchange. 1724.

Its Preface may be quoted :

As Italian and other Foreign Musick is frequently made Use of here in England, and as our Masters have adopted most of the same Words and Terms in their Musick and Compositions, as the Italians and others do in theirs, It is humbly presumed that a short Explication thereof will be very acceptable to all those who stand in Need of such a Help. This not being intended for the use of Masters, but only for such Gentlemen and Ladies, who being Lovers of Musick, nevertheless may possibly be ignorant of the true Signification of many of the said Terms, the understanding of which is very necessary, because a great Part of the Beauty and Agreeableness of Musick depends upon a right and proper Method and Manner of performing it : And nothing of this Kind having yet appeared in our Language, is the Reason that the following Explication, which at first was drawn up only for Private Use, is now made Publick ; which if it meets with a kind Reception, or occasions a better Performance of this Kind to appear, the Collector hereof will thereby think himself sufficiently rewarded.

It cannot be said that the information given in this 'Short Explication' is as complete or informing as it might be. For instance, we learn from one of its pages the following definition of a fugue :

FUGHA, a Fuge ; which is a particular Way or Manner, according to which some Musick is compos'd, and of which there are several sorts.

At the end of the book is 'An account of Printed Musick, for violins, hautboys, flutes, and other instruments, by several masters.' This is not exactly a catalogue, as no prices are given ; but its twenty-one pages furnish the names of some of the composers then in vogue (1724). One of the headings to its pages reads : 'Sonatas and Aires for one Flute and a Bass, commonly called Solos.'

A fine copy—most beautifully engraved by T. Cross—of John Church's 'An Introduction to Psalmody' (1723) has found its way to Mr. Taphouse's shelves. In this Psalmody the tune St. Ann's is definitely assigned to Dr. Croft. As Mr. Church was 'a Member of ye Collegiate Church of St. Peters, Westminster' (Westminster Abbey), concurrently with Dr. Croft's organistship of the venerable fane, there can be no doubt as to the authorship of that typical English church melody. The tune therein appears in its original form, the last line ending :

It is curious that present-day editors of hymnals, so prone to pride themselves on restorations of originals, should, one after another, omit the crotchet passing-notes which give added zest and dignity to this imperishable tune. While in this ecclesiastical region, reference may be made to 'The Divine Services and Anthems usually sung in His Majesties Chappell, and in all Cathedrals and Collegiate Choirs in England and Ireland. . . Collected by J. C.' (1664). James Clifford, the 'J. C.' of this early and interesting collection of 'words of anthems,' was the son of the cook at Balliol College. Born at Oxford in April, 1622, and educated at Magdalen College School, he became a chorister at Magdalen Chapel in 1632. Leaving the University without taking a degree, Clifford was appointed (in 1661) tenth senior Minor Canon in St. Paul's Cathedral, and subsequently Senior Cardinal. He died in 1698. An interesting feature of the book is that which prefaces the words of anthems. It reads: 'Brief Directions for the understanding of that part of the Divine Service perform'd with the Organ in St. Paul's Cathedral on Sundayes, &c.,' that is to say, during the latter part of the seventeenth century. These 'Directions' include (at 'the first service in the morning')—

After the Psalms, a Voluntary upon the organ alone.

After the third Collect is sung the first Anthem.

After the Blessing a Voluntary alone upon the organ.

But at the Evening Service there was, after the Psalms, a 'Voluntary alone by (!) the Organ,' and 'After the Sermon is sung the last Anthem.' The frontispiece to Clifford's book consists of a picture of David playing upon a six-stringed harp. Underneath this portrait of the poet-musician is the following punning rhyme :

See here the sacred Harp with wel-tun'd string,
Skillfully touch'd by a most pious King ;
Of whose great Actions after Gods own heart :
This is recorded too, He play'd his Part.

'Musick's Delight on the Cithern By John Playford, Philo-Musicæ (1666)' contains, in addition to an amusing preface, the following grave charge against the printer thereof, very naïvely expressed by Mr. Playford :

Some few Errata's (sic) having passed by reason of my absence, and the Printer's want of Skill in Musick, I crave the judicious to mend with a Pen these especially. (Then follow the 'Errata's especially.')

'Royal roads' and 'short cuts' as thoroughfares to the acquirement of musical knowledge are of ancient origin. Here is the title-page (very slightly reduced) of a book written by William Bathe, a learned Irishman born at Dublin on Easter Day, 1564 :

A BRIEFE INTRO duction to the skill of SONG:

Concerning the practise, set forth by William Bathe Gentleman.

In which work is set downe X. sundry wayes of 2. parts in one vpon the plaine song. Also a Table newly added of the comparisons of Cleues, how one followeth another for the naming of Notes : with other neces-sarie examples, to further the learner.

FABIVS.

Musica est honestum et incundum oblectamen-tum, liberalibus ingenij maxime dignum.

LONDON
Printed by Thomas Esle.

Mr. Bathe bears testimony to the excellence of his tuition methods in these words :

In a moneth and lesse I instructed a child about the age of eight yeeres to sing a good number of songs, difficult crabbed songs, to sing at the first sight, to be so indifferent for all parts, alterations, cleues, flats and sharpes, that he could sing a part of that kinde, of which he had neuer learned any song.

Present-day teachers of vocal-music and others may be interested in reading the following page from Mr. Bathe's sixteenth-century treatise :

THE ANTE RULES OF SONG.

To prepare for naming the Notes.

Practise to sunder the Vowels and Consonants, distinctly pronouncing them according to the manner of the place.

To prepare for Quantitie.

Practise to haue the breath long to continue, and the tongue at libertie to runne.

To prepare for Tune.

The skill of song doth consist	{ Naming. Quantitie. Time. Tune.
in foure things,

The frontispieces to many of these old music-books are often very quaint and instructive, as showing how certain old-world instruments were played. One of these, from Mr. Taphouse's collection, relating to the recorder, we also give in facsimile :

The title of this book reads :—

The | GENTEEL COMPANION ; | Being exact Directions for the | RECORDER : | With a Collection of the Best and Newest Tunes and Grounds Extant. |

Carefully Composed and Gathered by Humphry Salter.

London, Printed for Richard Hunt and Humphry Salter, at the Lute | in St. Pauls Church-Yard. 1683.

In the prefatory note to his 'Genteel Companion,' Mr. Salter waxes elegantly eloquent in his praise of the art, as hereunder set forth :

To all ingenious lovers of Musick.

I might as well perswade, that the Sun is a glorious, and beneficial Planet, as take pains to illustrate musick with my imperfect praises ; for every reasonable mans own mind will be its advocate. Musick, belov'd of Heaven, for it is the business of Angels ; desired on earth as the most charming pleasure of man. The world contains nothing that is good, but what is full of Harmonious Concord, nor nothing that is evil, but it is opposite, as being the ill favour'd production of discord and disorder. I dare affirm, those that love not Musick (if there be any such) are Dissenters from Ingenuity, and Rebels to the Monarchy of Reason.

Old-time notions of time are thus set forth by the said Humphry Salter in his 'Directions for the Recorder,' under the heading 'Of the Time and Proportion of the Notes' :

Tripple Time is multiplied by three, the notes having a prick added to it ; as one minnum with a prick is three crotchets, and so is barr'd with three or six in all tunes that are Tripple Time. This you must observe, where you see a prick follow a note, either in Tripple or Common Time, it adds half as much to that note, which goes before it, as the length of the note is, that is, if the note be a Minnum, then the prick or tittle is a crotchet, and so in all the rest of the Time.

The tunes in this book include a Bore and a Maggit !

Another treasure is the eight-page pamphlet entitled :—

TWO | ORDINANCES | of the | Lords and Commons | Assembled in Parliament, | For the speedy Demolishing of | all Organs, Images, and all manner of Superstitious Monuments in all Cathedrall Parish- | Churches and Chappels, throughout the Kingdom | of England and Dominion of Wales, the better to accom- | plish the blessed Reformation so happily begun, | and to remove all offences and things | illegall in the Worship| of God.

Die Jovis, 9 Maii, 1644.

Ordered by the Lords in Parliament Assembled that these Ordinances shall be forthwith printed and published.

Jo. Brown Cler. Parliamentorum.

London, | Printed for John Wright in the Old-baily.
May 11, 1644.

This title-page speaks for itself ; but the sentence wherein all organs were sentenced to silence may be quoted from the first of these Two Ordinances

And that all organs, and the frames or cases wherein they stand in all Churches and Chappels aforesaid shall be taken away, and utterly defaced, and none other hereafter set up in their places.

Playford's 'Musicks Hand-maid' has a very pretty title-page. Here it is, very slightly reduced:

Musicks Hand-maid:

New LESSONS and INSTRUCTIONS

FOR THE

Virginals or Harpsichord.

Engr. Paulson Sculp.

London, Printed for J. Playford, and are sold at his Shop near the Temple-Church. 1678.

In the 'Instructions' prefixed to the 'Lessons' (Pieces) in the above tome, Mr. J. Playford always omits the first 't' in spelling the word 'crotchet,' as some young ladies, more crotchety than crotchety inclined, do nowadays. As a means of solving the inevitable time difficulty, Playford suggests the adoption of a financial method. He says:

For the better understanding hereof, one ingeniously taught his scholars their Quantities, by comparing them to Money: the chief note or Semibreve to a Groat, the Minim to a Two-pence, the Crochet to a Penny, the Quaver to an Half-penny, and the Semiquaver to a Farthing; so that a small Accountant may soon reckon how many Pence, Half-pence, or Farthings, amount to this Groat.

One could go on quoting from these old-world and, to us in these days, amusing books did not considerations of space stay one's hand. A formidable catalogue could be made even of some of the rare volumes which Mr. Taphouse has 'picked up' and, by-the-way, has had most beautifully bound, beginning with the 'Theorica Musicæ' of Gafurius (1492), his oldest dated book. In addition to miscellaneous works on music (to some of which we have already referred) the library is rich in Lessons, Sonatas, &c., for the Virginal, Harpsichord, and Spinnet—beginning with Diruta's 'Il Transilvano' 1625; Operas, Odes, &c., including Henry Purcell's 'Musical Entertainment on St. Cecilia's Day' (1684); and Song-books. Among the last-named is an Oxford printed book entitled:

CHEERFUL AYRES | or | BALLADS | First composed for one single Voice and | since set for three Voices | By | JOHN WILSON Dr. in Musick | Professor of the same in the | University of Oxford.

Oxford.

Printed by W. Hall, for Ric. Davis.
Anno Dom. M DC LX.

The following extract from the Preface amusingly refers to this initial attempt at music-printing in Oxford:

This being the first Essay (for ought we understand) of printing Musick that ever was in Oxford, and the Printers being unacquainted with such Work, hath occasioned the faults hereafter mentioned, in this single Book, the greatest number whereof are the omission of Moods, which are supplied in the other two Parts, and will be easily mended with a pen in this. The consideration of what is here premised, with assurance that the other two Parts are more correct, and a promise of better care in what shall issue from this Presse for the future will (doubtlesse with unprejudic'd Persons) procure pardon for the present Errata.

It is not surprising to learn that Mr. Taphouse has made some 'finds' in the course of his long experience as a collector. Two of these merit special mention in that they relate to our great English master-musician Henry Purcell. In a portly volume of music—its 200 pages entirely in MS., and formerly in the possession of Bartleman—is a copy of a Violin Sonata by Purcell, the only known composition by him for violin with piano accompaniment. Through the keen eye of Mr. Taphouse this product of Purcell's genius was rescued from oblivion. This interesting collection of music, it may be added, was copied by Gulielmus Armstrong in 1691, and additions were made by one Edward Handwrit, several of whose compositions, in his own handwriting, are included in the volume.

AN EGYPTIAN PSALTERY
IN THE TAPHOUSE COLLECTION.

One day, when cataloguing the library of Oriel College, Oxford, Mr. Taphouse accidentally came across two other important and unknown Purcell compositions. These were 'The Queens Funerall March sounded before her Chariot,' and a movement entitled 'Canzona, as it was sounded in the Abbey after the Anthem.' The funeral was that of Queen Mary, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel, Westminster Abbey, on March 5, 1695. Here is the music of the former of these two pieces, adapted by Purcell from a passage in his music to Shadwell's 'The Libertine,' and arranged by him to be played on four trumpets at the interment of Queen Mary:

THE QUEENS FUNERALL MARCH SOUNDED
BEFORE HER CHARIOT.

MR. H. PURCELL.

These pieces, originally played on 'flat mournfull trumpets,' were performed, under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction, at the funeral of the late Duke of Cambridge in Westminster Abbey on March 22 last, this in all probability being the first time they had been heard since the obsequies of Queen Mary in the same sanctuary more than two hundred years ago.

No account, however fragmentary, of Mr. Taphouse's library would be complete without mention of the many autograph letters, musical MSS., &c., he possesses, in addition to a large number of portraits and bronze medallions of musicians. He has for many years made a valuable and an extensive collection of material for a 'History of Oxford music and musicians,' which it is hoped may some day be published. And then we must not forget to refer to those wonderful 'bundles' of miscellanea, all neatly arranged and indexed, which he has so industriously gathered together. These 'bundles' include cuttings, magazine and newspaper articles, illustrations, &c., &c., galore, all in perfect order and get-at-able in a moment. In this perplexing matter of 'papers' one envies Mr. Taphouse his methodical methods.

So far we have spoken of books and music. But there is another side to the worthy Councillor's collective zeal—his old musical instruments. These comprise members of the keyboard family, lutes, and other stringed instruments, recorders, flutes, &c., all too numerous to enumerate in detail. We may, however, give a list of his keyboard instruments:

- Clavichord. H. A. Hass Hamburg. 1743. Compass 5 octaves = F to F.
- Spinet. Johannes Harrison Londini Fecit. 1749. 5 octaves.
- Virginal. Italian. Compass $3\frac{1}{2}$ octaves = E to C.
- Clavicembala. Italian. Two strings, one plucked by a quill plectrum, the other by a leather jack. Compass $3\frac{1}{2}$ octaves = E to C.
- Square Pianoforte. Johannes Pohlman Londini Fecit. 1769. Compass $4\frac{1}{2}$ octaves = G to F. Three stops.
- Clavichord. Nicola Palazzi Romano Fecit. 1776.
- Harpsichord. Burkat Shudi et Johannes Broadwood Londini, fecerunt 1781. Double Keyboard. Compass 5 octaves = F to F. Two pedals. Six stops.
- Square Pianoforte. John Broadwood & Son, London. 1796. Compass 5 octaves = F to F.

Replying to an inquiry as to how he commenced collecting old instruments, Mr. Taphouse says:— 'In the year 1857 I purchased the remarkably fine harpsichord by Shudi and Broadwood which I believe is now at St. Michael's College, Tenbury. It formerly belonged to a Colonel Bowles of North Aston House, near Banbury, and was knocked down at the sale of his effects for the sum of thirteen shillings! I bought it of the purchaser for £2 10s. and then sold it to Messrs. Broadwood for £15. This led me to take an interest in the history and development of keyboard-stringed instruments, and I collected some interesting specimens of clavichords, spinets and harpsichords, several of which I restored and exhibited at the Inventions Exhibition of 1885. About the time that I began collecting (in 1857) I made the acquaintance of the late Mr. A. J. Hipkins who, with his unfailing kindness, gave me many valuable hints upon the restoration of old instruments. For upwards of forty years I had the pleasure of corresponding with Mr. Hipkins on various musical matters.'

In connection with old keyboard instruments it is interesting to learn from the lips of Mr. Taphouse about his intercourse with Mr. Ruskin. He says:— 'I was in my shop talking to Dr. Harford Lloyd one day when in walked Mr. Ruskin, whom I did not know until Dr. Lloyd informed me. About that time a man called "Jolly Nash" was much to the fore as a writer and singer of comic songs, and some frontispieces to those ditties were exhibited in my shop window. Mr. Ruskin asked if he might have some of the "Jolly Nash" songs. I replied: That all depends upon the use you intend to make of them. If you wish to exhibit them as illustrating the musical tastes of Oxford Undergraduates—as you did some time since of a collection of prints—I object, as it would be manifestly unjust to a large number of Members of the University, who study and practise the best classical music, to class them with the singers of comic songs. He said he had no intention of using them for that purpose, and I gave him an assortment for his edification or otherwise. This led up to a conversation on musical instruments. Mr. Ruskin expressed the desire to become acquainted with the various methods of instrumental sound production. I showed him my collection, and gave him a description of the characteristics and development of each group of instruments. He appeared to be greatly interested, and said he could much more clearly understand their variety in construction and the quality of tone they were capable of producing by seeing the instruments themselves. On leaving he shook me very warmly by the hand, and expressed the pleasure he had had in meeting me, and stated that he had learnt more in his interview with me than from the whole of his previous readings on the subject. Mr. Ruskin was particularly interested in the harpsichord. He frequently came to my house in order that my daughter might play to him. On these occasions he was delighted with the different effects produced by varying the stops and using the swell of the harpsichord, and expressed his appreciation in most gratifying terms.' We may here mention, by-the-way, that Miss N. Taphouse is an excellent performer on the harpsichord, having made it a special study. She played at one of the lectures given at the recent Loan Exhibition of the Musicians' Company, and in November next she proposes to give a special concert of old-world music at Oxford.

'Mr. Ruskin once asked me,' continues Mr. Taphouse, 'if a system of figures, or letters, could not be used in playing musical instruments without the necessity of learning musical notation. I told him some such systems were used in performing upon the penny whistle, German concertina, harmonica, and others of a simple character, but I thought they could not be applied to more elaborate instruments. He replied that he had once invented a system of playing the pianoforte upon some such plan, and that he had ordered an instrument to be made in accordance with his ideas; 'but,' he added, 'it was a ——— thing when it was finished.'

In concluding this chit-chat on a valuable music library, something should be said concerning the interesting career of its possessor. Thomas William Taphouse was born February 11, 1838. Leaving school at the age of fourteen, he worked as a cabinet-maker for four years. In 1857 his father and he commenced business as musicsellers and musical instrument dealers at 10, Broad Street, Oxford. (The business is now carried on by his son at 3, Magdalen Street.) After learning the science of pianoforte-tuning in London, Mr. Taphouse practised as a pianoforte-tuner in and around Oxford for thirty years. Not content with devoting himself exclusively to the commercial side of music, he took lessons on the pianoforte and harmonium from Richard Porter, organist of St. John's College and St. Martin's Church. For seventeen years he discharged the duties of organist at Oxford—first at the Wesleyan Chapel and afterwards at George Street Congregational Church. Mr. Taphouse says: 'The organ at George Street, originally placed in the Sheldonian Theatre, was a very interesting instrument, built by Father Smith. Tradition says that it had frequently been played upon by Handel. It had "short octaves"—G, C, A, D, B, E, F, and, in my time, an octave and a quarter of pedals. In the year 1760 the instrument was removed to St. Peter's-in-the-East Church, and from thence to George Street Congregational Church. It was afterwards broken up, but the open and stop-diapason stops were incorporated into the large organ now in Paignton Church, Devonshire.'

Notwithstanding the claims of a hard-working and busy life, Mr. Taphouse has found time to devote some of his energies to Municipal matters. He was elected a member of the Oxford City Council in 1888; served the office of Sheriff in 1892-93, when the foundation stone of the New City Buildings was laid, and has been Curator of those buildings since their completion and opening by the Prince of Wales (now King Edward VII.) in May, 1897.

In the spring of this year (1904) the greatest satisfaction was felt, not only in Oxford but by his many friends, when the University of Oxford conferred upon Mr. Councillor Taphouse the honorary degree of Master of Arts. This was indeed a distinction—as unique as it was deserved—to thus honour a tradesman of the University city. In proof thereof we may quote the following extract from The Oxford Magazine of March 16, 1904—an appreciation which, it is an open secret, came from the pen of one of the highest authorities in the University:

We must offer our very best congratulations to Mr. Councillor Taphouse on the Honorary M.A. which is being very properly bestowed upon him by the University. He is an admirable member of a series of citizens who have deserved well of literature, art, and science, of which Oxford can be justly proud. The late Mr. Boswell, and our friend Mr. Claridge Druce, have touched and adorned Botany. Mr. Taphouse has served specially the cause of Music, of Painting, and of the antiquities of the City. His collection of old musical instruments and old music has long been one of the best in the county, and those in our midst who know most of the subject, like Sir John Stainer and his successor, Sir Hubert Parry, or Mr. Hadow, have been foremost in acknowledging their indebtedness to it, while all who love the antiquities of the place and the history of its local art are equally gratified for many pieces of help modestly and quietly rendered.

One of the most modest and kind-hearted of men, the subject of this sketch is held in the greatest respect by all who know him. Unselfish to a degree, he is always delighted to generously place his wide knowledge and experience and the treasures of his library at the disposal of those who would benefit themselves and others thereby, and the undersigned is by no means the only writer on music who has reason to name with gratitude the name of Thomas William Taphouse.

DOTTED CROTCHET.

MUSICAL HOUSE-SIGNS.

I'm amused at the signs,
As I pass through the town,
To see the odd mixture,—
A Magpie and Crown,
The Whale and the Crow.
The Razor and Hen,
The Leg and Seven Stars,
The Scissors and Pen,
The Axe and the Bottle,
The Tun and the Lute,
The Eagle and Child,
The Shovel and Boot.

British Apollo, 1707.

Signs, as distinguishing features of houses, are of great antiquity. Not only are they mentioned by classic writers, but specimens, both painted and carved, have been found at Pompeii and Herculaneum. Coming nearer home, every trade had its emblem, some of which still survive—e.g., the three balls of the pawnbroker and the barber's pole, though the latter is less common than formerly. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries painted signs were greatly in evidence, by reason of their huge proportions and their noisy creakiness. These signboards were often a source of positive danger: in 1718 one of them actually dragged down the front of a house in London and killed four persons by the fall thereof. No wonder that by Act of Parliament signboards in London had to go. To what extent they ornamented or disfigured a great thoroughfare like Cheapside our illustration will show. House-signs in London began to be replaced by the numbering of the houses towards the close of the eighteenth century. The signboards were taken down in the Parish of St. Botolph in 1767, St. Martins-le-Grand in 1769, and in Marylebone in 1770, to mention a few instances; by about 1773 they had practically disappeared from the Metropolis.

The nomenclature of the old signboards is as extensive as it is quaint and amusing; but we must confine ourselves to those that are musical or connected with music. We may, therefore, divide our subject into two sections: (1) signs formerly used by publishers of music and others, and (2) some musical tavern-signs now in use.

It is chronologically convenient to begin with animals, the first of which is the hedgehog, and was not music in days of yore 'pricked'? Away back in the sixteenth century the 'Certayne Psalmes of Francis Seager' (1553) were 'Imprinted at London by wylliam Seres, at the sygne of the Hedge Hogge.' Note the importance given to the prickly animal with its two capital letters, while the initial letter of the printer's Christian name is relegated to 'lower case.' The next animals on our list are of various hues, some unnaturally so, as we shall see. Thomas East (Este, or Est) is the name of a well-known publisher. He lived in Aldersgate Street, 'at the signe of the blacke Horse,' where he issued music composed by Byrd and others. The White Lion was the sign adopted by Thomas Adams, 'dwelling in Paules Church-Yard,' the publisher of 'Deuteromelia: or the second part of Musicks Melodie, or Melodius Musicke of Pleasant Roundelaies; K. H. [? King Henry VIII.'s] Mirth, or Freeman's Songs, and such delightfull Catches (1609).' Still keeping to this Zoo-like region, we may pass on to the Tiger's-head where, in St. Paul's Churchyard, dwelt one Lawrence Lisle, the publisher of:

Ayres made by severall Authors and sung in the Maske at the Marriage of the Right Honourable Robert Earle of Somerset, and the Right Noble Lady Frances Howard. Set forth to the Lute and Base Violl, and may be exprest by a single voyce to cyther of those Instruments (1614).

John Browne kept a music-shop in Cornhill bearing the sign of the Black Lyon. His trade card stated: 'At the same place [i.e., this Black Lyon's den] you may hear of a Master for any instrument now in use.' The White Bear in Adling Street, near Barnard's Castle, would, in Elizabethan days, have found John Windet, a printer of repute who afterwards removed to Powle's Wharfe, where, at the Crosse Keyes, he printed many editions of Sternhold's Psalms. The Buck was the punning sign of Mr. J. Buckland, living at Paternoster Row in 1762, the printer and publisher of 'A Book of Anthems, &c., compiled by C. Ashworth.'

Birds, as well as beasts and fishes, were laid under contribution in providing the names of house-signs. The first of the ornithological species in our purview is the Falcon, or Faucon, as the following rhyming title—not altogether a model of present-day spelling—tells us:

A Godly Psalme, of Marye Queene, which brought us comfort al, through God, whom wee of dewty prayse, that gives her foes a fal. By Rychard Beearde, Anno Domini, 1553. Imprinted at London in Fleete-strete, at the sygne of the Faucon against saint Donstans Church by Wylliam Griffith: and are to be solde at his shoppe a lytle above the Conduit.

The Peacock, at the west end of St. Paul's Churchyard, is where Richard Clavel lived and moved and had his being in the year wherein Bach and Handel were born. He printed, from movable type, Richard Goodridge's 'The Psalter, or Psalms of David, paraphrased into verse and set to new tunes,' of which Mr. T. W. Taphouse possesses a copy. Another bird, the Owl, is coupled with the Lyre—to be quite truthful, the sign was The Lyre and Owl. There dwelt in St. Martin's Lane, about 1767, an enterprising music printer and publisher bearing the pugilistic name of Fought. We learn from Mr. Frank Kidson's 'British Music Publishers'—to which we are indebted for much information on the subject of this article—that by reason of the rapid printing of music from metal type, Mr. Fought 'was enabled to undersell the publishers of engraved music, and by this he appears to have gained much ill-will in the music trade.' Hawkins says the London music-sellers fought Mr. Fought by copying his publications, and, by underselling, drove him, a Laplander, out of the kingdom. At the Dolphin and Crown, at the west end of St. Paul's Churchyard, Mr. John Young sold various musical instruments, 'also al sorts of Musick, Rul'd paper, and Strings, at Reasonable rates.' In 1707 he could supply 'Pills to Purge Melancholy' (for outward application only), while 'A Catch upon Mr. Young and his son' rhymed thus :

You scrapers that want a good fiddle well strung,
You should go to the man that is old while he's Young,
But if this same fiddle you fain wou'd play bold,
You should go to his son, who'll be Young when he's old.
There's old Young and young Young, both men of renown,
Old sells, and young plays the best fiddle in town.
Young and old live together and may they live long,
Young to play an old fiddle, Old to sell a new song.

Two famous music-publishers of olden time were able to dispense with the use of a sign. The first is the celebrated John Day, the earliest printer of music in England. The Colophon of his books—Psalters, &c.—states: 'Imprinted at London by John Day, dwelling over Aldersgate, beneath Saint Martins. These bokes are to be sold at his Shop under the gate.' (1561, &c.) A hundred years later (1650) we find John Playford selling his publications 'at his shop in the Inner Temple, neere the Church doore.' From thence issued many important musical works. Not that Playford confined his business operations exclusively to music, for in 'Select Ayres and Dialogues,' published by him in 1669, there appeared the following advertisement :

At Mr. Playford's shop is sold all sorts of ruled paper for musick and books of all sizes ready bound for musick. Also the excellent cordial called the Elixir Proprietatis, a few drops of which drank in a glass of sack or other liquors is admirable for all coughs, consumption of the lungs, and inward distempers of the body; a book of the manner of taking it is given also to those who buy the same.

Also if a person desires to be furnished with good new Virginals, and Harpsicons, if they send to Mr. Playford's shop they may be furnished at reasonable rates to their content.

Heads, of human beings, may come next—the said heads including Arne's, Corelli's, Haydn's and Handel's. Harrison, a music publisher of Cheap-side, in 1788 adopted the sign of 'Dr. Arne's Head.' He published the first edition of the vocal score of The Messiah. A music engraver of note (and of notes) in 1731 was one William Smith, a former apprentice of John Walsh, who lived at the sign of Corelli's Head, opposite Norfolk Street, Strand. He had a type of his own, 'remarkably steady and uniform,' and published :

The Skylark, a collection of all the Divine Odes and Hymns taken out of the Spectator (c. 1730).

The firm of Goulding, afterwards Goulding and D'Almaine, adopted, in 1787, 'Haydn's Head' as the sign of their premises, 6, James Street, Covent Garden. This firm were the original publishers of 'Home, sweet home.' Robert Birchall, formerly an important music publisher in London, commenced business at 129, New Bond Street about 1780, according to Mr. Kidson. The business subsequently became Birchall, Lonsdale, and Mills, but Lonsdale started on his own account at 26, Old Bond Street, taking with him the original bust of 'Handel's Head,' the sign adopted by Birchall when he commenced business. Lonsdale's shop has now passed into the possession of Mr. Alfred Hays, but the bust of Handel, regilded and renovated, still stands above the side entrance of the house—No. 26, Old Bond Street.

It may be sufficient merely to give the names of the sundry signs used by other music publishers; these are the Sun, Starre, Crosse Keyes, Crowne, Orpheus, Apollo, Bible and Crown, Looking-glass, Golden Anchor, Golden Ball, and Golden Crotchet, the last-named sign distinguishing, till within recent years, the city branch of Messrs. Novello's business.

As might be expected the names of musical instruments were largely used by music publishers and sellers of musical instruments. We find, among others, Golden Harpe and Hoboy (used by Walsh, Handel's publisher), Harp and Crown, Harp and Flute, Two Flutes and Violin, Two Flutes and Hautboy, Lute, Three Lutes, Guitar and Flute, Golden Viol, Bass Violin, and Bass Viol and Flute. Benjamin Cooke adopted the sign of the Golden Harp at his music-selling and publishing business in New Street, Covent Garden, where his son, Dr. Ben. Cooke, afterwards organist of Westminster Abbey, was born.

A curious and interesting London house-sign of the sixteenth century was that of the Organe Pype, situated in the parish of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, the supposed residence of a certain Mr. Howe, an organ maker. The parish accounts of the year 1508 record a payment to the said John Howe of sixpence 'ffor mendyng of the Small organs'! This instrument doubtless occupied a place in the church of St. Stephen's, Walbrook. In 1548-49 there is an entry :

Payd to Mr Howe, organ maker, for mending of the organs and for his fee iij*s*.

and in the following year :

Item. Master Howe, Skynner, for the orgayne pyps, weyyng v :xx xij li at l*vs*. vd.
vd the li.

But there are still earlier disbursement references to the 'organnys' in that church, e.g., in the year 1483 :

It'm, payd to Ray, Carpynt'r, ffor making off ye story ffor the organnys xxxvj*s*. viij*d*.

and in 1510-11 three payments :

It'm, payd for a payr of cros garnatt for the dore of ye organs v*d*.

It'm, payd for a gret Rope, for the organs, weyng xij*lb* xij*d*.

It'm, payd for ij staves vnd the bynche
[under the bench] in the loft w' y' orgons v*d*.

The organ-blower's salary, circa 1536, is thus recorded :

It. paid to Saunder for his wag' for blowing of ye Orgaynes j*d*.

'A peyre of Orgons' and its appurtenances are thus described in an early fifteenth-century document :

Also, in ye same Rode lofte is a peyre of Orgons, and a lyd on' ye keys, w*t* lok and keye, of borton's wyvis yifte, grocer. [The gift of Mrs. Borton, the grocer's wife.]

Also, a stondyng lecterne for to ley on a boke to pleye by.

Also, a stole to sit on whan he play on ye Orgons.

It should not be forgotten that John Dunstable, 'an astrologian, a mathematician, a musitian, and what not,' who died in 1453, is buried in St. Stephen's Church, Walbrook. According to Stow the remains of this distinguished fifteenth-century musician were deposited under 'two faire plated stones in the Chancell, each by other.'

The second part of this subject—some musical tavern-signs now in use—may be deferred till a future occasion.

Occasional Notes.

Music, music, heavenly music !
Queen of every morning measure !
Sweetest source of purest pleasure !
Music, why thy powers employ
Only for the sons of joy ?
Rather let thy numbers pour
On those whom secret griefs devour :
Bid, be still ! the throbbing heart
Of those whom death or absence part ;
And, with some soft whispered air,
Soothe the brow of dark despair.

Antonin Dvorák has left in manuscript many works written at an early period of his career, and it is said that they will all be performed during the coming season at Prague. They consist of a String Quartet in A (Op. 1), a String Quintet, a Symphony in B flat (1865), another in E flat (1875), and a third in D minor, in addition to two Overtures, one entitled 'Tragic' the other 'Dramatic.' Among letters he preserved are two from the recently deceased Eduard Hanslick, in the second of which he asks Dvorák, on the part of General-Intendant Baron Hofmann, whether he would be inclined to write an opera for Vienna, to be produced in 1885 or 1886. Only one letter from Brahms has been found, in which the great composer expresses the marked sympathy which the rehearsals of his (Dvorák's) new works have won for him amongst musicians at Vienna; this was in 1879. In a letter acknowledging the dedication to him of a work, Bülow writes: 'A dedication from you—next to Brahms, the most God-gifted composer of the present day—is a greater distinction than a cross, however big, from a prince, even of the highest rank.' There are many letters from Dr. Richter showing the high esteem in which the great conductor held the man and his works.

The field of 'arrangements' is a varied one, even without its variation corner. Gleanings in that vast domain will result in the finding of Handel's Hallelujah chorus arranged for two flutes, and Rossini's Stabat Mater metamorphosed into a set of quadrilles. Moreover have not the devotees of Terpsichore been provided with a Waltz constructed from Mendelssohn's Songs without Words? Yes, and the piece in question is before us, scored for full orchestra, and published. The Introduction section consists of the Lied in E (No. 9), to which succeeds the Waltz proper, and, as becometh its light fantastic toe propensities, in a triplet of themes :

No. 1, Piccolo delicato.

No. 2,

No. 3,

No. 1 of the foregoing examples is a rhythmically perverted adaptation of the favourite Lied in A (No. 30), composed by Mendelssohn during one of his visits to London, at Denmark Hill, on June 1, 1842. What would he have said to this valsification of his sprightly arpeggioistic strains?

The result of the competition for the Grand Prix de Rome is as follows:—The first grand prize has been awarded to M. Pech, pupil of M. Lenepveu, and winner of the second grand prize in 1903; the first 'second grand prize' to M. Pierné, also a pupil of M. Lenepveu, of whom honourable mention was made last year; and the second 'second grand prize' to Mlle. Fleury, pupil of M. Widor. M. Lenepveu, two of whose pupils have thus distinguished themselves, was himself the winner of this coveted blue riband of French music in the year 1866.

The various biographical dictionaries, English and foreign alike, state that Pietro Castrucci died in London in the year 1769, except that one of these books of reference gives Rome as the place of his death, while another says that he died in the year 1750! The following extracts, kindly sent by Mr. W. H. Grattan Flood, show that this distinguished violinist and pupil of Corelli drew his last breath, not at London nor Rome, but at Dublin in the year 1752, seventeen years earlier than the date invariably given. Here is the documentary evidence:

Last Saturday Morning died, aged 84, the celebrated SIGNOR PETRO CASTRUCCHI, last Scholar of Corelli, who was for 25 Years first Violin to the Opera in London, and at five this Evening is to be interred at St. Mary's; and, on Account of his great Merit, will be attended by the whole Band of Musick from the New Gardens in Great Britain Street, who will perform the Dead March in Saul, composed by Mr. Handel.—The Dublin Journal (Faulkner's), Saturday March 7 to Tuesday March 10, 1752.

The next issue of the same journal—dated March 10 to March 14—gives a short but interesting account of the funeral in these words, verbatim et literatim:

On Tuesday last the Corps of Signor Petro Castrucci was interred at St. Mary's Church, the Paul was supported by six Performers. Mr. Dubourg as chief Mourner and was also attended by his Majesty's whole Band of State Musicians [the Dublin Castle State Band] who performed the Dead March in Saul; the Funeral was attended by a vast Concourse of People.

Assuming the age stated above to be correct, we are enabled to arrive at the year of Castrucci's birth, which took place at Rome. In 1715, at the age of forty-seven, Castrucci came to England with Lord Burlington, and for several years he led Handel's band. The Daily Post of February 26, 1731, announced his benefit concert to be given on that day, at Hickford's Great Room, Pantion Street, near the Haymarket. The advertisement describes Castrucci as 'First violin to the opera,' and makes mention of his concert as—

A compleat Entertainment of vocal and instrumental Musick; with several concertos of his [Castrucci's] own compositions, particularly a solo, in which he will perform 24 notes with one bow, and the 1st and 8th concertos of his master the famous Corelli.

Schœlcher, in his Life of Handel (1857), p. 126, gives the correct year of Castrucci's death—'1752, at the age of eighty-four': not so the dictionaries.

Professor Franklin Peterson, Professor of Music in the University of Melbourne, writes us as follows, under the date of August 3, 1904:

The returns for our newly-instituted Local Examinations have just come in. The first year we had nearly 500 entries, last year upwards of 800, and I find that there is a corresponding increase this time.

We gave our midwinter concert a fortnight ago, when M. Paderewski honoured us with his presence and stayed till the end of the programme. He received a great ovation on entering the room, and paid us a very high compliment in giving his opinion of the various performances, especially in the Chopin Concerto, the excellence of the orchestra in the accompaniment thereto, and the playing of the orchestra generally.

Apropos of the burning Ecclesiastical question now agitating Scotland, and knowing that Overtures are a recognised feature of kirk-life north of the Tweed, a correspondent suggests that someone should compose an 'Overture to the Wee Frees'—the principal subject to be assigned to the shrillest notes of the piccolo, as best representing the airs of the High landers.

The Hon. Secretary of the Folk-Song Society (Miss Lucy Broadwood) has issued the following useful and practical 'Hints to Collectors of Folk Music':

In the case of songs, it is better if two persons can join together in taking them down—one to confine his attention to the words, the other to the tune. If this cannot be managed, it is advisable for the collector not to encourage the singer to repeat the words without the music, as any alteration of the usual way in which the songs are delivered is apt to confuse the singer's memory. For the same reason, if any repetition of a part of the song is required, it is best to allow the singer to start afresh from the beginning of the verse.

It is suggested that, in view of the special difficulty of the work of taking down songs, the collector should make no attempt to write down words or music until after the first verse has been gone through. He will probably find that he is then able to grasp the rhythmic structure of the tune, the mode in which it is cast, and to settle upon a key-signature and time-signature.

Sometimes the collector will find it difficult to note both rhythm and correct intervals simultaneously, and it will be best therefore for him to choose definitely which of the two he will try to obtain first. Two or three repetitions of a song may be necessary, and, after the whole tune has been noted as carefully as possible, there should be a final repetition for the sake of testing the correctness of the transcript. The collector need not fear to call upon the ballad-singer to repeat a song many times.

It very often happens that an example of folk music is in possession of persons who cannot sing. These may be asked to whistle the airs, or to play them upon a violin or other instrument. Care must be taken in such cases to ascertain whether the tune is originally set to words or not.

Although folk music is to be found in all strata of society, the classes from which the most interesting specimens are most readily to be obtained are gardeners, artisans, gamekeepers, shepherds, rustic labourers, gipsies, sailors, fishermen, workers at old-fashioned trades, such as weaving, lace-making and the like, as well as domestic servants of the old school, especially nurses. Inmates of workhouses will also be found to know many old songs, and dwellers in towns may best be able to carry on the work of collecting traditional music by applying to such.

It is most important that the collector should obtain all possible information from the singer as to the title and history of the song or tune, the manner in which it was learned, and the name, age, status, &c., of the person from whom it was learned.

Just as it is desirable that the words of a ballad should be given exactly as they were repeated, so it is essential that the tunes should represent what the collector hears. Many a fine and characteristic tune has been spoilt by being submitted for correction to some local musician, who, in the attempt to reduce it to orthodox or modern form, has allowed the individual character to escape. It is far better to send in the tune even in a rough, unbarred condition than to endanger its authenticity by such an expedient as is here referred to.

Those who do not feel themselves competent to note down the music may still do useful work by discovering singers, making a list of the songs that the latter can sing, and communicating with the Hon. Secretary of the Society, who will then, if possible, send an expert to note down the songs.

When collected, the songs, &c., may be sent to the Hon. Secretary of the Folk-Song Society, Miss Lucy Broadwood, 84, Carlisle Mansions, Victoria Street, London, S.W., who will bring them before the Publication Committee of the Society.

Dr. W. H. Cummings writes apropos of his article in the September issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES on Bar-lines :

Eitner's facsimile (so called) of Agricola's 'Musica Instrumentalis,' published in 1896, gives on the outer cover and on the first title-page the date 1528. Careful examination, however, shows that the author, Martin Agricola, signed his address to the printer on St. Bartholomew's Day, 1528, and that the latter—Rhaw, of Wittenberg—published the book in 1529.

Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams writes as follows on the same subject :

I have read Dr. Cummings's article on bar-lines in your last issue with much interest. The origin of the vertical lines frequently seen on staves before the days of tablatures is undoubtedly to be found in the pausa, or rests, which marked the distinctiones, or musical periods of Plainsong. This is explained by ancient writers, e.g., by Quintilian, thus: Quoad pausam . . . si distinctio sit major, id est hoc signo notata (a vertical line across the staff) fit mora cum plena respirazione. Distinctio seu pausa minor, ad hoc signum (a vertical line across the middle portion only of the staff), dat etiam cantandi respirandi copiam. It will be seen from this quotation that the breathing places corresponded with the musical phrasing, and that they were (sometimes, by no means always) shown by larger or smaller vertical lines across the staff.

No general rule, however, seems to have obtained, and the pausa were used as frequently as not to show the connection between words and notes, or the groupings of the neumes into syllabae of two or three notes, rather than as places to pause for breath.

I append a translation of the composition referred to by Dr. Cummings, taken from a twelfth century law book in the Bodleian Library. It will be observed that the vertical lines on the upper staff divide the notes more or less according to the words: while those on the lower staff are not so numerous, perhaps because if the upper voice sang its part correctly the other could easily follow. The lines in the bass staff seem designed, with one exception, to mark the so-called distinctiones, or lines of the poetry. Since this composition does not come into the category of Measured Music, and the notes, like those of Plainsong, have no relative values, I have made an entirely arbitrary suggestion as to its rhythmical scheme :

Fow - les in ye frich : Ye fis - sis

in ye fiod : And I mon wax-e wod : Mulch sorw I walk - e wich for beste of bon and blod.

Many of the large staves of the thirteenth century and onwards have vertical lines 'scored' through them to show the proper connection between words and notes. In a thirteenth century MS. (Plate 9 of 'Early English Harmony,' published in photographic facsimile by the Plainsong and Mediaeval Music Society), consisting of a two-part composition on a staff of eight lines, the words and music are thus divided by lines scored through the whole :

2 notes	5 notes	3 notes	5	1	5
Omnis	rectitudinis	amator :	plenarie	fons	sapientia

A Franciscan Gradual, in my possession, from the suppressed monastery of Anghiari, near Arezzo, written about 1460, shows little bars, similar in appearance to those in the Bodleian law book: their object is to mark the proper grouping and accentuation of the neumes, and I have observed that they appear in other Franciscan Graduals of that period. They never divide a single note from its neighbours, as in the Bodleian MS. and the other composition alluded to above.

I think there is little doubt that the modern use of the bar-line, to show regular rhythm and accent, originated in the instrumental tablatures, and was only slowly accepted by the mensuralists. It was not really required in mensural music, for its function was exercised by the 'Point of Division,' which in its earliest days was a little vertical stroke across one line of the staff. As a marked accent was of more importance to instruments than voices, most of the tablaturists enforced its observance by drawing lines across their 'tables' at regular intervals, and these were gradually adopted for vocal staves.

The Librarian of the Conservatorio of San Pietro a Majella at Naples showed me many works published in that city in the seventeenth century without bars: the latest that I saw was a book of duos for solfeggi, by Christoforo Caresana, 1693. Gregorio Strozzi, in his educational work 'Elementorum musicae praxis,' 1683, gives no bar-lines, though his 'Capriccios,' for organ or cembalo, are barred regularly.

Bar-lines seem to have been used in North Italy before they penetrated to the south. The opera 'Eurydice,' 1600, is barred throughout, and so are the works of Carlo Gesualdo, Principe di Venosa, 1613.

That England was not behindhand in adopting this very important improvement in notation is shown by Dr. Cummings's remark that many of the examples in Morley's book (1597) are barred.

We have pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to an unusually interesting article (on the following page) on Music in Shanghai, written by Mr. F. L. Crompton, who, for the past fifteen years, has held with distinction the organistship of the Cathedral in that far-away city of the Celestial Empire. We are further indebted to Mr. Crompton for the illustration which accompanies his article.

Here lieth before us the printed specification of an organ which mentions the 'choir slops.'

The Royal Choral Society, now in its thirty-fourth year, announces that the following works will be given during the approaching season: The Song of Hiawatha, The Witch's Daughter (Mackenzie), Faust, and The Childhood of Christ (Berlioz), The Apostles, and Handel's Acis and Galatea and Ode to St. Cecilia's Day, in addition to the customary performances of Elijah and The Messiah.

MUSIC IN SHANGHAI.

In view of the Titanic struggle now focussing the eyes of the civilized world upon the Far East, it is hoped that the following brief notes of musical affairs in Shanghai may not prove altogether uninteresting to readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

The city of Shanghai—which is not many hours' steam from the theatre of war—may be said to be the commercial capital of China, deriving this not unreasonable claim to the title from the enormous and valuable trade in tea, silk, and piece goods, its vast shipping, important docks, wharves, and warehouses, and its factories and filatures. Neutrality being strictly guaranteed by the European Powers, complete immunity is enjoyed from danger without, while peril within would be promptly nipped in the bud by the various men-of-war in port co-operating with the local land forces, volunteer and police, any turbulent section of the native crowd receiving but sharp and short shrift for their trouble, as they have only too well learnt to their cost in the past.

With the preamble concluded, we now come to the raison d'être of these notes on Music in Shanghai. The Foreign Settlements boast in a quiet way of a Philharmonic Society, Choral Society, and other kindred institutions, French, German, and Italian. The two senior bodies, the pioneers, are at present in a state of suspended animation owing to untoward circumstances. They have certainly done good work in the past, and having paved the way for the advancement of the art, there is no reason why, with an infusion of new blood, they should not brace up and strive for further progress.

The difficulty of permanent efficiency lies in the ever-fleeting population. For instance, as regards orchestral music, some seasons there may be capital players of viola and violoncello, and then things run smoothly enough. At other times the exigencies of business, trips to Europe or retirement from China deprive the band of these indispensable members, and then, alas! one is on the horns of a dilemma, making shift as best one can by requisitioning the ever-blessed piano. How greatly to be regretted it is that both the aforementioned instruments are so neglected, at any rate abroad. Everybody wants, as it were, to sing first soprano, and it requires not a little tact to persuade the ambitious but well-meaning amateur to play second violin and so give the poor contralto division of the orchestra a fair chance!

The community is extremely fortunate in being able to count upon the kind services of skilled performers, ladies and gentlemen, of flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon, so one has much to be thankful for in that respect. The remainder of the wind-work is supplemented by professional musicians from the Municipal Band, composed of Filipinos, the race of half Spanish and Malay hailing from the Philippine Islands. These men have apparently inherited the love of music from their Spanish conquerors, and are very dependable performers when not engaged in some clannish feud in which the knife sometimes plays an effective part in determining such trifles as love quarrels, gambling, cock-fighting, or any other virtue under the sun.

The Philharmonic Society, formed a good many years ago by a small but earnest band of amateurs, has often given very good performances of the symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven (the choral excepted) and Mendelssohn, besides drawing on the rich stores of Schubert, Schumann, Gounod, Gade, and other masters. Since the decadence—only temporary, it is to be hoped—of the Society, concerts symphonic, ballad and promenade, have been successfully carried on by private enterprise, the programmes including Beethoven's C major Pianoforte Concerto,—played by Frau Gessner, a brilliant pupil of the late Clara Schumann—Bizet's Petite Suite, Saint-Saëns's Danse Macabre, Prelude du Deluge, and several attractive novelties.

The Choral Society, reorganized in 1894, has given with full orchestra The Messiah, Hymn of Praise, Athalie, Gallia, The Bride of Dunkerron, The Revenge, The Banner of St. George, &c. This organization labours under disadvantages analogous to the Philharmonic, for it is both painful and ludicrous to relate that on more than one occasion a cantata, after long and careful preparation, has had to be abandoned at the eleventh hour owing to the lack of a suitable soprano or tenor soloist. Shanghai choral work is thus sometimes seriously hampered in not being able to engage the services of professional vocalists for important works.

The Amateur Dramatic Club occasionally soars into the realms of light opera, having staged with thorough completeness and success most of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas as well as other favourites.

To this city of all nations and tongues the summer out-door concerts of the Municipal Band, under the auspices of the Council, prove a great boon, being thoroughly appreciated by both children and adults, who, in spite of the sweltering heat, flock to the Public Gardens to listen with rapt attention to the programme of music provided for their delectation. Especially enjoyable are the evening concerts, when fortunate owners of house-boats entertain friends at dinner on board their craft, which lie moored a short distance from the Gardens. The soft cool breeze, the moonlight night, and the strains of melody gently wafted over the rippling river are pleasant memories never to be forgotten. An Italian bandmaster directs the Filipino musicians, the band mustering about thirty all told. In winter they are in great demand orchestrally at public and private dances, theatricals, and other functions, earning large fees, which are equally divided between the Band Fund and the men themselves. The up-keep of this Municipal Band costs the ratepayers considerably over a thousand pounds per annum.

Holy Trinity Cathedral, the large handsome Gothic edifice designed by Sir Gilbert Scott, may be termed the headquarters of Church music in Shanghai. The well-equipped library contains most of the standard anthems and services of composers ancient and modern. Among many favourite anthems are: 'The Wilderness' and 'Blessed be the God' (Wesley), 'I saw the Lord' (Stainer), 'Whoso dwelleth under the defence,' and 'The great day of the Lord' (Martin), 'How dear are Thy counsels' (Crotch), and excerpts from the standard oratorios. With regard to services, those by Stainer easily head the list in popularity; but Harwood in A flat is an especial favourite, while Smart (the B flat Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in particular), Stanford, Calkin, Tours, Hopkins, and many others are beloved of the singers. The choir of ladies and gentlemen—that rara avis a really good boy's voice being practically unknown—fight shy of some of the older services, having an unaccountable prejudice against the alto and tenor clefs printed in the folio editions of days gone by. Nevertheless they have been coaxed into giving a good account of Lloyd in E flat which is published with the aforesaid clefs. So there is still a glimmer of hope that the hidden treasures (of which there are many in the library) of the giants of old may not remain a sealed book much longer.

The Cathedral possesses a beautiful three-manual organ, built by Messrs. J. W. Walker and Sons. It is worthy of note that this highly-esteemed and enterprising firm has made a speciality of designing instruments to withstand the vicissitudes of climate in the Far East and with the happiest results, the organs erected in Hong Kong and Singapore Cathedrals, Canton Church and Union Church in Shanghai testifying to the excellence and durability of their workmanship. Mr. B. G. Tours, one of the British Vice-Consuls and a son of the late Berthold Tours, in spite of his many arduous official duties, very kindly finds time to act as temporary organist of the Cathedral since the present writer has recently resigned that office owing to ill-health. The services during the latter's organistship of over fifteen years have been modelled as far as possible on the lines of St. Paul's Cathedral, the chant-book in use being St. Paul's Cathedral Chant-Book, and, of course, the Cathedral Psalter. May it be remarked, without unbecoming levity, that Shanghai can give points to St. Paul's as regards time, being nine hours and some odd minutes, seconds and semiquavers ahead! It may not be unworthy of note to place on record the fact that oratorio, cantata, and services have received appropriate renderings in the sacred edifice by augmented choir, orchestra and organ under the conductorship of the undersigned, Sullivan's Te Deum in E flat giving particular pleasure to the church militant as represented by the Shanghai Volunteer Corps.

What will readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES say of the cosmopolitan character of the orchestra, the members of which are British, American, French, German, Russian, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, and Filipino? Must not the conductor be gifted with extraordinary linguistic capacity? And how does he control his forces under such exceptional circumstances? The answer is easy enough as far as the writer's experience of wielding the baton at Shanghai is concerned. Music itself, the universal language, backed up by a few Italian phrases, is the happy medium for overcoming all obstacles and removing all difficulties.

Distinguished musicians are by no means strangers to Shanghai. The American prima donna, Madame Eames, wife of Mr. Julian Story, was born there. Among many visitors may be mentioned the late Madame Patey and her husband, Madame Amy Sherwin, Madame Minnie Hauk and Ovid Musin, all of whom gave highly successful concerts. May other artists who feel inclined to stray away from home and make a temporary sojourn in the Flowery Land follow the good example and travel to the hospitable shores of the Foreign Settlements: in so doing they will have no cause for regret, and may rest assured of a hearty welcome and pleasant time.

The profession of music is not considered of much account in the Celestial Empire; indeed, it is relegated to mendicants and the blind! Show a native a foreign musical instrument of any kind, or some wonderful invention, musical or otherwise, and he expresses no astonishment and does not even shrug his shoulders; but he blandly informs you that all these things were known in the Middle Kingdom thousands of years ago!

What will be the dénouement of the drama which is being enacted in the Liao-tung peninsula and Manchuria it would be hazardous to forecast; but, at any rate, lovers of music in the British Isles will be glad to learn that the art is not neglected over seas. On the contrary, it is being pursued with an enthusiasm and steadfastness of purpose by their exiled brethren, which should evoke the sympathy and best wishes of all who reside in the home-land.

THE ENGLISH BUND (PROMENADE) FROM THE FRENCH SEMAPHORE STATION.

MENDELSSOHN'S SCOTCH SYMPHONY.

(IN A MINOR. OP. 56.)

BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.Vivace non troppo.Adagio.Allegro vivacissimo, and Allegro maestoso assai.

Mendelssohn paid his first visit to Great Britain in 1829. After passing the musical season in London, conducting his Symphony in C minor at the Philharmonic, and his Midsummer Night's Dream Overture at another Concert—both for the first time in this country—and playing Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat; hearing debates in the House of Commons, going to an infinity of balls, and otherwise madly enjoying himself—after all this, he and his friend Klingemann started at the end of July for a six weeks' journey in the Highlands. He was then just twenty years old, in the rich springtime of his wonderful youth, the very soul of gaiety and activity, and of hearty, happy spirits. The tour comprised much of the finest scenery of the Highlands, from Staffa to Loch Tay, and from Edinburgh to Blair Athol, and much that was characteristic of the country, including the gathering of the clans at the last-named place. Of the impressions made by the journey, the Scotch Symphony and the beautiful Overture known as 'The Hebrides,' or 'Fingal's Cave,' are the two chief musical records. The abundant letters which he sent to his friends are other—though he himself would certainly have said* not more detailed or definite—chronicles of his thoughts or feelings. The two great orchestral works just named form in themselves a whole gallery of Scottish pictures, in which the Pianoforte Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 28), originally entitled by its author 'Sonate écossaise,' and probably also the Fantasia in A minor for pianoforte (Op. 16, No. 1)† and the two-part song 'O wert thou in the cauld blast?' may be minor works. Both Symphony and Overture were planned and begun during Mendelssohn's residence in Italy in 1831—that season of production in which he conceived or matured no less than four of his greatest and most characteristic works, namely, the Hebrides Overture, the Italian and Scotch Symphonies, and the Walpurgis Night.

There is no doubt that the work was intended to record his Scotch reminiscences, for the name 'Scotch Symphony' is his own; and though not attached to the score it occurs in his published letters. His unpublished letters also supply the date of the first conception of the subject of the Andante and the reason of the profound melancholy which pervades it, and tinges more or less the whole of that movement, and of the Allegro which follows it. Writing to his family from Edinburgh on July 30, 1829,‡ soon after the arrival of himself and Klingemann in Scotland, he describes his visit 'in the deep twilight' of the summer evening to Queen Mary's Palace of Holyrood,

* See his remarkable letter to Souhay (October 15, 1842): 'Words seem to me so ambiguous, so vague, so unintelligible when compared with music. . . . What music expresses to me is not too indefinite to put into words, but too definite.'

† Written at the house of Mr. Taylor, at Coed Du, near Holywell, North Wales, on September 4, 1829, on his way back from Scotland. No. 1 (Andante and Allegro) has the inscription 'Rosen und Nelken in Menge'—Roses and pinks in plenty. One member of the nosegay still blossoms in the little pocket-book he then carried with him—a carnation, drawn in pencil, full size, and carefully dated with the date just given. Mrs. Austin, who knew him well, has told us of 'the pensive character which he attributed to his favourite carnations' (Fraser's Magazine, April, 1848), a character well reflected in the Andante referred to; and in the Life of Moscheles (English translation, i. 297) we find it mentioned as his favourite flower, which he loved to have given to him. [See also 'The Mendelssohn Family,' by Sebastian Hensel, English translation, i. 224, 227.—Ed. M.T.]

‡ This letter was shown to me by Dr. Karl Mendelssohn, the son of the composer, at Freiburg. [It is now printed in 'The Mendelssohn Family,' English translation, i. 197.—Ed. M.T.] his sympathy with the Queen, the effect that the sight of her rooms and of the scene and marks of Rizzio's murder had produced on him, and the roofless chapel. He adds: 'I believe I found to-day in that old chapel the beginning of my Scotch Symphony.' And after he had returned to his inn 'the daughter of the hostess sang a song in minor,' and he became very much depressed, and then the subject again came into his mind. The first sixteen bars of the Andante as then written down, exactly as they open the Symphony, and with the date, 'Edinburgh, 30th July, 1829, Abends,' were given by Mendelssohn to Klingemann at or very shortly after the time:—

No. 1.

Andante con moto.

The autograph of the finished score is dated January 20, 1842, more than twelve years after the date of its first conception.

Counting the 'Reformation' and 'Lobgesang,' this is the fifth of his published Symphonies. On the printed score it is denominated 'No. 3'—No. 1 being the C minor, and No. 2 the 'Sinfonia Cantata,' or Lobgesang (Hymn of Praise), which has as much right to the name Symphony as Beethoven's Ninth (the Choral Symphony), its obviously artistic parent, has. Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, like the 'Reformation,' was not published during his lifetime, and these two are therefore, as far as order of publication goes, Nos. 4 and 5. But in order of composition the five stand as follows:—

1. Symphony in C minor - - 1824
2. Reformation Symphony - - 1830
3. Italian Symphony - - - 1833
4. Lobgesang - - - - 1840
5. Scotch Symphony - - - 1842

Although not finally completed till 1842, at Berlin, the fifth symphony occupied Mendelssohn's thoughts more or less frequently during the interval between his visit to Scotland and that date, as is evident from the frequent references to it in his letters.

The first performance of the work in England was at the concert of the Philharmonic Society on June 13, 1842.* Mendelssohn himself conducted, and both the composer and his music were received with the greatest enthusiasm; the applause was uproarious after each movement, the Scherzo was redemanded, and an attempt—not successful—was made to obtain from the Directors of the Society a repetition of the performance. The letters in which Mendelssohn arranges with Sterndale Bennett for his arrival and for the dates of the concerts which he was to conduct will be found in the Appendix to Hogarth's 'History of the Philharmonic Society.' The Symphony appears to have been previously played at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on March 3 (1842), and repeated at the following concert. It is dedicated to 'Victoria, Queen of England,' from whom Mendelssohn obtained the necessary permission during a visit to Buckingham Palace, which he describes in a long letter to his mother dated July 19, 1842.†

* In the programme of this concert the work is simply described as 'New MS. Sinfonia in A minor,' without any reference whatever to its Scottish origin. In the score it is simply entitled 'Symphonie No. 3,' with the dedication to Queen Victoria.—[Ed. M.T.]

† An English translation of this letter is printed in 'Goethe and Mendelssohn.' Second edition, p. 141.

Yours sincerely
J. W. Tappin

This Symphony, like Schumann's Fourth (in D minor) and Mendelssohn's own Violin Concerto, exhibits the peculiarity that it is to be played throughout as one piece, the movements following each other rapidly, without the customary intervals. This is expressly directed by the author in a preface to the printed score, of which the following is a translation:—

'The several movements of this Symphony must follow one another immediately, and not be separated by the usual pauses. For the information of the audience its contents may be stated on the programme as follows:—

SINFONIA.

Introduction, and Allegro agitato,
Scherzo Assai vivace,
Adagio, cantabile,
Allegro guerriero, and Finale maestoso.'

It will be observed that the names of the movements here given are different from those now prefixed to the music itself and stated at the head of this notice.

Neither here nor in the 'Italian' Symphony does the score include trombones. That Mendelssohn could use the 'brass' with effect is shown in the 'Lobgesang,' the Overture to 'Ruy Blas,' and other works, but he seems to have feared it almost as much as Mozart is known to have feared the trumpet.* 'If I proceed slowly with St. Paul,' says he, in an English letter to William Horsley, 'it is at least without trombones, and I flatter myself to have been as moderate in the use of brass as an enemy of the Birmingham industry or a friend to invalid trumpeters could have wished; for out of twelve choruses in the first part there are but two with the brass band, and the beginning is even without trumpets.'†

I.—The Symphony opens (contrary to Mendelssohn's practice in his C minor and Italian Symphonies) with an introductory movement, Andante con moto, in 3-4 time. This Andante, sixty-three bars in length, is, by a curious coincidence, of the same extent, within one bar, as the Poco sostenuto to Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7). Mendelssohn starts with the subject already quoted (No. 1), a regular strain, in two portions of eight bars each, harmonized (as if in allusion to the national music of Scotland) for the wind band and the lower strings only—violins in the first portion, and violas, violoncellos, and basses in the second, the violins silent throughout, and nothing to obscure the shrill prominence of the oboes. This is immediately succeeded by a passage, for the first and second violins in unison, of extraordinary energy:—

No. 2. sf Violins 1 & 2 in unison.

(Notice here the use of the Scotch scale, in which D sharp succeeds C natural and G sharp succeeds F natural.) After a short time the original subject (No. 1) is heard in the wind instruments, but the violins maintain their accompaniment figure to the end of the Introduction. The personality which distinguishes the instruments of the orchestra is rarely more marked than in this Symphony. As Schumann says, 'They talk like people,' and people of the most varied and marked character. It is impossible, for instance, not to notice at the close of the Introduction how the flutes begin calling in the intervals between the violin arpeggios, as if impatient for what is to come next:— and we shall find many another instance.

II.—The 'first subject' of the Allegro un poco agitato which follows, and of which we can only quote eight bars out of twenty-two, is closely related to that of the Introduction (No. 1):—

It is announced by the strings, with the clarinet (an instrument specially honoured by Mendelssohn, and seldom more than in this particular work) in octaves below the first violins—at that time a new combination. Between the 'first' and 'second' subjects of the movement an episodic idea intervenes, the concise character and abrupt rhythm of which are in strong contrast to the flowing melody which precedes it:—

Of this episode much use is made at a later time. It is given out by the whole band fortissimo, the pace at the same time quickening to Assai animato.

The second subject—in the dominant key of E minor, not the relative major key of C—is remarkable for the same northern cast as before (C natural succeeding D sharp, &c.). Like its predecessor (No. 4) it is two strains of eight bars each, the melody of the first strain being given out by the clarinets:—

and that of the second by the first violins; the accompaniment in both strains being ingeniously formed of a phrase out of the 'first subject' itself. A beautiful episode or tributary theme, itself a modification of a portion of the principal subject, is used as a Coda to the first part of the movement:—

* See Edward Holmes's 'The Life of Mozart,' p. 11 (1878 edition).

† 'Goethe and Mendelssohn,' Second edition, Letter 6, p. 113. The trumpets were afterwards added to the first chorus, though very sparingly.

The first part of the movement is repeated from the double bar, according to the prescribed form. The second part is remarkable among many beauties for two especial things:—First, for the long and bold series of modulations with which it begins, on a fragment of the 'first subject' (No. 4). In this extraordinary passage the strings of the orchestra move down in energetic unison from E—by D sharp, D natural, C sharp, C natural—till they land on B natural. The following is the phrase which is thus repeated again and again:—

No. 8.

The pianissimo maintained during the first fourteen bars, then the crescendo, and at length the fortissimo, as the phrases increase in rapidity till at last they reach their climax, deepen the impression produced by the progression of the notes. It is remarkable, secondly, for the variety obtained by the introduction of a long solo for the violoncello, preceding and accompanying the re-entry of the first subject, and itself accompanied by the horns and bassoons. (This does not need quotation.)

The Coda of the movement, which is long and important, begins with a progression for the strings in unison, in semitones, of the same nature as that already quoted (No. 8), but rising (from A to C) instead of falling:—

No. 8a.

Strings in unison.

Following this, and growing out of it, is the vigorous and picturesque passage known—though with what authority is doubtful—as the Storm. The Coda is throughout extraordinarily bold and energetic. We have noticed the call of the flutes at the close of the Introduction. Not less eager, and more martial, is the cry of the clarinets in the triumphal close of the Allegro:—

No. 9.

as if unable to restrain their warlike elastic ardour. Their energy subsides, however, in a chromatic descent diminuendo, and leads into a portion of the introductory Andante; so that the movement ends as it began, with the plaintive strain which was the actual origin of the whole work.

This Allegro was a great favourite with Wagner, who has left his opinion upon it in unmistakable terms.*

Church and Organ Music.

THE TUNE 'HOLLINGSIDE.'

Hymn-tunes are often christened in an arbitrary manner. Their designations give no clue to their origin. St. Ann's is a case in point, its designation having no raison d'être, unless one knows that it is named after St. Anne's Church, Soho, of which its composer, Dr. Croft, was organist. So with the tune 'Hollingside.' 'Why was it thus named?' The answer to this question we will now endeavour to give.

It is hardly necessary to say that the composer of 'Hollingside' was the Rev. J. B. Dykes—born in 1823, died in 1876, aged fifty-two. In July, 1849, he was appointed to a minor canonry in Durham Cathedral, and four months later to the Precentorship of that magnificent sanctuary. In a letter to his sister announcing the latter appointment he says:

I am thinking seriously of starting a small establishment, and trying a little bachelor housekeeping. The fact is there is at present a very pretty cottage to be let, about a mile out of Durham, with a nice bit of garden and a very fine prospect; and houses of every description are so difficult to meet with here. I shall want some instructions in the art and science of house-furnishing, and gardening, and servant hiring if I do, but I have not made up my mind yet.

On the following May-day (1850) the young Precentor first occupied that 'very pretty cottage'—named Hollingside Cottage, and this bijou habitation—originally built for an invalid who could not walk upstairs—gave the name to the hymn-tune. One of his sisters thus describes Hollingside Cottage:

All the externals of that sweet home have left a most vivid impression on my mind—the low, one-storied cottage, with its deep verandah covered with creepers, the undulating garden which surrounded it, the beauty of the woods around, and the walk to the Cathedral, to which we generally went twice a day, as well as the joy my brother felt in the service.

Some scenes during that visit will live for ever in my memory. As, for instance, one calm Sunday evening, when I sat in the verandah in the deepening twilight, and heard, through the open window, my brother composing and playing over the tune 'Hollingside' to the words 'Jesu, lover of my soul.'

Hollingside Cottage has now been enlarged by the addition of an upper storey, and it is with regret that we cannot procure a photograph of the house in its original state. As Dr. Dykes, soon after his marriage, removed to a larger house, it may be assumed that 'Hollingside' was composed between 1850 and 1853. The tune made its first appearance in print in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' issued in 1861; but it was doubtless first sung, from manuscript copies, in the Galilee of Durham Cathedral at one of the Sunday evening services held therein.

During the autumn of 1860 the clergyman-composer first heard of the proposed publication of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' At the suggestion of some friends he ventured to write to W. H. Monk, the Musical Editor of that now well-known hymnal, in the following terms:

Durham, Oct. 12, 1860.

... You will I trust pardon the liberty I am taking, in addressing you, being personally a stranger to you.

I venture however at the request of Mr. Twells [author of 'At even, ere the sun was set'] and also of Mr. Wilkins to send you a few MS. tunes for your inspection, thinking it possible that some of them might do for your forthcoming book. I may, perhaps, in case I find time, send one or two more to-morrow. Of course, you will fully understand that you are not, in any sense whatever, bound to accept any one of the accompanying tunes. I trust that in your responsible position of Musical-Editor of the work, you will (in respect of them, as of all others) adopt none but such as you deem really worthy of admission. . . . I just send up these slight contributions, in case they may be of any service.

* Wolzogen's Erinnerungen an Richard Wagner (1883), p. 36. The whole passage on Mendelssohn is extremely interesting and instructive.

The other tunes [other than Dies Iræ] I have at different times written, finding myself unable to discover suitable music for the Hymns. Some of them have been sung in the Galilee of Durham Cathedral, and are very popular.

Although this letter was written only five months before the book appeared, seven (if not all) of the tunes he sent to Monk were inserted in the first edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' These seven tunes are among the most popular composed by Dr. Dykes:—

- | | |
|---------------------|--|
| St. Cross | ... O come and mourn with me awhile. |
| Nica | ... Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty. |
| St. Cuthbert | ... Our blest Redeemer, ere He breathed. |
| Hollingside | ... Jesu, lover of my soul. |
| Horbury | ... Nearer, my God, to Thee. |
| Dies Iræ | ... Day of wrath, O day of mourning. |
| Melita | ... Eternal Father, strong to save. |

Many other hymn-tunes—nearly 300 in fact, as the published collection shows—came from the pen of Dr. Dykes, who, in writing them, was inspired with the gift of melodic simplicity and the spirit of true devotion. In 'Hollingside' the melody really consists of five lines, three of the eight lines being repeated. The few skips are nearly always those constituting the key-chord, while the remainder of the tune is stepwise in its melodic tread. It all seems so easy, but how few attain unto it!

In a letter written by Dr. Dykes to his future wife, he says:

By the bye remember that procrastination is one of my greatest, if not my greatest besetment; so take care and never allow yourself to offend in that point; you must select some other besetment for yourself from which I am comparatively free. It is a most tiresome failing, and I wish most heartily I was rid of it, as it causes a world of annoyance.

In this procrastination connection Hollingside Cottage was about half-an-hour's walk from Durham Cathedral, and it was a joke in the neighbourhood that Dr. Dykes was always so late in starting for church that he had to run the whole way regularly: but he always arrived in time, though sometimes so out of breath that on more than one occasion one of his 'dearly beloved' clerical brethren kindly volunteered to commence the service for him.

He was an excellent organist. During his incumbency of St. Oswald's Church, Durham, the keyboard of the organ was situated so close to the reading desk that he would often read the service and turn round to play the organ when occasion required. To return to the hymn-tunes. He would cause his newest tunes to be sung in the vicarage drawing-room on Sunday evenings by the members of his family and friends: this 'august tribunal' used to decide whether a tune would 'take'; if the judgment was an adverse one, he always altered or re-wrote the strain, he being most anxious to compose tunes that were really singable.

A few words may be said in regard to the hymn with which 'Hollingside' is so happily wedded. It is hardly necessary to say that this sacred lyric—'Jesu, lover of my soul'—was written by the Rev. Charles Wesley (1707-1788). It first appeared in his 'Hymns and Sacred Poems,' in five stanzas of eight lines, headed 'Temptation.' This collection was published in 1740, a year after the official date which is given as the founding of Methodism by John Wesley, the author's brother. 'Jesu, lover of my soul' has found its way into the hymnals of all English-speaking countries, and it has been translated into many languages.

The information above given has been derived from 'The Life and Letters of John Bacchus Dykes,' edited by the Rev. Canon Fowler (John Murray); 'Personal Memories,' by Fanny Dykes, printed for private circulation; and personal recollections kindly furnished by the composer's brother, Mr. Edward O. Dykes.

Mr. Alfred Hollins met with a triumphant reception on the occasion of his first organ recital in the Town Hall, Sydney, on Saturday evening, August 13. An immense audience of some 3,000 persons—which included Her Excellency Lady Northcote and the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress of Sydney—greeted the gifted sightless player from England with genuine enthusiasm. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major and Mr. Hollins's own Intermezzo had to be repeated, and at the conclusion of the recital he received 'a crown of cheers' for a masterly rendering of the overture to Oberon—a performance suggestive 'in its strength and splendour, of those—

Organic harps diversely framed
That tremble into thought as o'er them sweeps
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze.'

We give some extracts from the Sydney newspapers recording Mr. Hollins's successful début in Australia, the first of which is preluded with the head-lines 'The Milton of Organ Music,' and 'An Admirable Artist':

The history of art is rich in the records of the achievements of brave men under circumstances of trial, tribulation, and affliction. Alfred Hollins, whose sweeping success at the Town Hall on Saturday night invested the first of his series of organ recitals with the dignity and distinction of a first-class musical event, is a living representative of this glorious brotherhood. Not as a 'calmly laurelled' hero, but as a cultured and capable musician, he stands—with something of the nobility of true greatness—as a type of the mould of men who, in the intellectual and artistic sense, rise—

On stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things.

The half-imaginative pictures presented to us in this artist's playing may be described as the embodiment of the harmonies which are the illumination of a mind from which the light of sun and moon and 'all the spangled host' is blocked out. Apart from the notation of the text that he is called upon to expound, all the wealth of music which is the possession of this admirable artist comes from 'the inner fount of life.' All that is best and brightest and bravest in his imagination finds eloquent expression in the music which he interprets with such well-balanced force, fidelity, and felicity.

On Saturday there was witnessed the spectacle of a totally blind player overcoming all difficulties with wonderful simplicity of action. Never did organist control the great instrument with such ease and confidence; he made his changes of stop and mechanical combinations with astonishing facility; never faltering, as a man will at times who possesses his sight, but instantly and unerringly reaching forth and drawing the stop he wanted from the many ranks on the right or left, or effecting the needed 'composition' from among the closely-set push buttons that stud the front of each keyboard. But there is room for a little latitude in locating stops and buttons; there is none whatever when it comes to striking the keys. Here Mr. Alfred Hollins, with his rapid changes from one keyboard to another, showed an amazing sense of location. The confident way in which he pounced upon the powerful tubas for a passing phrase, or struck, without preliminary touch, a sonorous chord, was something that made the numerous brotherhood of the organ present marvel.

The playing of Mr. Hollins is full of life and intelligence. Vital and vivid, it is absolutely free from the morbidity and turgidity into which so many academic organists decline. And to his sustained breadth and power this most remarkable artist adds abundant technique, a clear and confident musical touch, great finger equality and velocity, and a warm and emotional temperament which is proof against the evils of mechanical meanness and the monotony of mediocrity.

THE COMPOSER OF 'ST. CLEMENT.'

The death took place suddenly on September 10, at Godalming, of a clergyman-composer of hymn-tunes, the Rev. CLEMENT COTTERILL SCHOLEFIELD, aged sixty-four. The youngest son of the late Mr. William Scholefield, for twenty years a Member of Parliament for Birmingham, the Rev. C. C. Scholefield was born at Edgbaston on June 22, 1839. He held curacies at Hove, St. Peter's, South Kensington, and St. Luke's, Chelsea. From 1880 to 1890 he held the office of Conduct at Eton College, and became Vicar of Holy Trinity, Knightsbridge, from 1890-95. A self-taught musician, Mr. Scholefield is chiefly and widely known as the composer of the hymn-tune St. Clement, associated with the late Canon Ellerton's inspiring evening hymn, 'The day Thou gavest, Lord, is ended.' The tune, specially composed to these words, first appeared in 'Church Hymns' (1874), edited by the late Sir Arthur Sullivan. During the preparation of the book, or very shortly before its preparation, Sullivan held the organistship of St. Peter's, South Kensington, of which church Mr. Scholefield was then a curate, hence the appearance of the tune in 'Church Hymns,' a fortuitous circumstance which has been exceedingly rich in soul-uplifting results.

Mr. E. H. Lemare gave during the past month organ recitals at Lowestoft, Yarmouth, Hartlepool, Sheffield (Albert Hall), the Town Halls of Huddersfield and Middlesbrough, and the Cathedrals of Lincoln and Glasgow. The prospectus for the coming season (the fifth) of the Brixton Oratorio Choir includes promised performances of the following works on Sunday afternoons and other occasions in Brixton Church: The Messiah, Creation, Redemption, Stabat Mater (Rossini), Calvary, Daughter of Jairus, Passion (Graun), Psalms 42 and 95 (Mendelssohn), and Hear my Prayer, all to the accompaniment of a full band. The orchestral services are to be continued, these and the oratorios conducted, as heretofore, by Mr. Douglas Redman, organist of the church. We venture to suggest the inclusion of a Bach Church Cantata in the scheme of the Brixton Oratorio Choir and similar organizations.

LEEDS FESTIVAL NOVELTIES.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE'S

'THE WITCH'S DAUGHTER.'

Of late years Sir Alexander Mackenzie has given vent to the lighter side of his genius by letting the humour which bubbles up in his conversation creep into his music. In The Witch's Daughter the esteemed musician has given us another example of his power to treat romantic subjects effectively. John Greenleaf Whittier's poem is a pastoral idyll, one that deals in the simplest manner with the cruelty of prejudice, beauty in distress, and sturdy manhood. To ally such a story to complex music would be contrary to its spirit, and consequently Sir Alexander's strains must be listened to in the frame of mind in which the poem is read, that is to say, with a mind open to receive impressions but expecting no subtleties of deep and dark meaning.

The composer deals not with leit motifs, but in the thirteenth and fourteenth bars of his short instrumental introduction occurs the phrase :

EX. 1. (♩ = 56.)

To this succeeds a rhythmically vigorous setting of a Corn Song from Whittier's 'Songs of Labour,' wherein the chorus heartily join thus :

più animato, ben marcato.

Ex. 3. We bet-ter love, we bet-ter love the hard-y gift,

Thereupon succeeds a short female chorus singing—
And the wind whispered, 'It is well !'

Here the poem ends, but as musical requirements forbid the composer to silence his muse, Mr. Julian Sturgis has supplied the concluding eight lines of the Epilogue :—

Not in the old world's prime
Was poet's age of gold,
But wheresoe'er in happy time
The tale of love is told.
Strong heart to guard the weak,
True heart to love the strong,
There is the golden age we seek,
And there the crown of song.

These two stanzas are set for soprano and baritone duet and chorus in a manner that happily illustrates the final words 'the crown of song.' The orchestration of the work is by no means the least attractive feature of a cantata that will be looked forward to with interest and to which we wish all success.

DR. WALFORD DAVIES'S 'EVERYMAN.'

That the Morality play calls for musical treatment may perhaps be open to doubt ; but it must be admitted that Dr. H. Walford Davies, the gifted organist of the Temple Church, has written music that invests the ancient mystery with fresh interest. Moreover the grotesqueness which at times incites an involuntary smile while witnessing its presentation on the stage, is replaced by a solemnity that impresses. An atmosphere of exalted dignity indeed pervades Dr. Davies's score, and indicates a depth of conception and power of expression possessed by few. This solemnity is at once apparent in the opening bars of the Prelude :

Ex. 1. Lento espressivo. (♩ = 58.)

This Prelude, though of only thirty-two bars, gives the key-note of the entire work. It leads directly into the Prologue—the address to the audience—which with considerable boldness of design is successively and sectionally delivered by bass, contralto, soprano, and tenor soloists. The words of the Deity are set to a five-part chorus, Largo solenne, intended to be sung unaccompanied. Beginning pianissimo, and working up to a fortissimo at the summons of Death, it should prove most impressive. Death having answered and received his commands, the chorus ends as softly as it began.

The next number is a tenor solo sung by Death. Its tempo is Allegro impetuoso, and the accompaniment, wild and restless, appears to suggest the seeming cruelty and capriciousness of the enemy of mankind. The part of Everyman is written for a bass voice, and the individualities of Death and Everyman are cleverly maintained in the dialogue between the grim summoner and him that is summoned. Everyman's subsequent lament is echoed by the chorus, and the note of true pathos is sounded in the reiteration of the question by the choir pianissimo 'Everyman, what wilt thou do?' as though the burning question in his mind found utterance without himself.

The second section begins with the appeal to friendship so brightly and assuringly answered until the purpose of the request is made known. This provides the highly necessary contrast in so serious a subject, and the composer makes good use of his opportunities. The music is vigorous and hearty and the climax dramatic. The scathing words of Riches are also set as a chorus, but the weakness of Everyman's Good Deeds finds appropriate expression in a soprano solo. Knowledge has also a solo part (for contralto), but her song is taken up in echo fashion by a four-part chorus. Everyman's prayer is an expressive number, instinct with the agony of the stricken soul. Good Deeds having grown stronger by Everyman's repentance, they sing a duet of soothing character. Knowledge, Good Deeds, and the chorus join in encouragement, and the scene ends in an effective climax in seven vocal parts.

The third section opens with a repetition of the passage quoted above. This portion is short but impressive, for in it Everyman dies. The work concludes with an Epilogue, a carefully, and it may be added, a lovingly elaborated movement of great musical interest, which brings a composition of high aims and great power to an imposing conclusion.

The National Co-operative Festival Society held its seventeenth annual meeting at the Crystal Palace on August 27. The musical part of the proceedings commenced with the annual choir contests, adjudicated by Dr. E. H. Turpin. The winners of the Plunket Shield for juniors were the Portsea Island Choir, the Gloucester Choir winning the Novello trophy for senior choirs. A concert by the assembled junior choirs, numbering 1,500, and conducted by Mr. C. J. Jeapes, then took place on the Handel Orchestra. In the afternoon an organ recital was given by Mr. Frank Idle, and subsequently a concert by sixty combined choirs (adults), assisted by an orchestra numbering over 150 performers. The programme included a varied selection of choral pieces, notably the chorus 'When His loud voice' (Jephtha) and Gounod's 'By Babylon's Wave.' These were excellently sung under the able direction of Mr. Allen Gill.

Herr Louis Zimmermann, the distinguished Concertmeister and solo violinist of the Amsterdam Orchestra, has been appointed Professor of the violin at the Royal Academy of Music, to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Mr. Willy Hess.

MR. HARRY EVANS.

It is a fact worth noting that the programmes of the Royal National Eisteddfod held recently at Rhyl, and of the Cardiff Festival held September 21-24, together introduced three choral works of considerable dimensions by Welsh composers. The Welsh musical soul has always showed yearnings to create as well as to execute; but it has to struggle for recognition beyond the borders of the Principality.

Is there a characteristic Welsh modern style, and, if there is not, should it be the aim of budding composers to create one? We venture to say that the answer to both questions is in the negative. We may perceive and welcome a fairly distinctive character in Welsh national song, but in the efforts of Welsh composers in the higher branches of composition the desire seems to be to cultivate a cosmopolitan, if a somewhat conventional style, rather than a special and national one. The late Dr. Joseph Parry had occasional visions—somewhat vague in expression—of a poetical and highly imaginative character which, if they had been controlled by a clearer sense of form, might have earned wide fame for the composer. But even as it was, the peculiarities of Dr. Parry's style exercised considerable influence over young Wales.

We do not say that this influence can be traced in the works recently brought out, for it is clear that all three composers have, for better or for worse, their individual ways and styles. Whether their new works will survive even the average life of a Festival 'success,' or whether they deserve to do so, are questions we do not propose to discuss. It is enough here to give great credit to all three composers for their strenuous endeavours in the interests of their art and the reputation of their nationality. At least they can claim that their achievements have helped to keep open a door to fame through which a genius may some day be encouraged to enter.

The following are brief particulars of the three works and their composers.

CAPTIVITY. An oratorio composed by MR. D. EMLYN EVANS.

The libretto of this work is by Goldsmith. It deals with the captivity and subsequent delivery of the Israelites. The music is composed for three solo voices, chorus, and full orchestra. It has been in Mr. Evans's portfolio for a good many years in an incomplete form, and was not originally designed for Festival use, but rather for the resources of small choral societies. Mr. David Emlyn Evans was born near Newcastle Emlyn, Cardiganshire, on September 21, 1843. He resides in South Wales, and leads a busy life as an adjudicator, conductor, and musical critic.

JOB. An oratorio, the libretto arranged and the music composed by MR. DAVID JENKINS.

This work is built on a large scale. It calls for no fewer than twelve solo voices. Mr. Jenkins, following distinguished modern precedents, is his own librettist. He is the most experienced of living Welsh composers. Many of his works have been brought out at Welsh Festivals, and have also found favour in London and many provincial centres. The Legend of St. David, a dramatic oratorio, and David and Saul, cantata for soli, chorus and orchestra, are two of his best-known works. The new oratorio Job—which, it is only fair to state, was designed before the appearance of Sir Hubert Parry's oratorio on the same subject—exhibits Mr. Jenkins at his best. It is more modern in general style than his previous works. Mr. David Jenkins resides at Aberystwyth. He was born at Treacastell, Brecon, January 1, 1849, and graduated Mus. B. at Cambridge in 1878.

THE VICTORY OF ST. GARMON. A dramatic cantata composed by MR. HARRY EVANS.

The libretto of this work is by Mr. H. Elvet Lewis. It deals with the 'Alleluia' battle supposed to have been fought in the fifth century near Mold, in North Wales. Such a story naturally calls on the whole for vigorous treatment, but the libretto also allows scope for quiet pastoral effects. Mr. Evans's music is highly modern in style and texture, the orchestra being employed very freely to illustrate the text and situations. The composer resides in South Wales. He conducted the choir which won the first prize at the Royal National Eisteddfod, held at Llanelly, in 1903. But he is by no means an uncritical admirer of Eisteddfodau as generally managed: he is inclined to mend or end them.

Mr. David Stephen, of Glasgow (formerly of Dundee), has been appointed Musical Director of the Dunfermline Carnegie Trust. This Trust administers £25,000 per annum, the interest on half-a-million sterling given by Mr. Carnegie to the town to assist 'to bring sweetness and light into the lives of the inhabitants.' Music is to be a prominent feature of the scheme. We hope Mr. Stephen will be happy and successful in his new sphere of work.

The prize of £10 offered by Messrs. Chappell and Co., Ltd., for the best Quick March for a military band—the competition being restricted to musicians of H.M. Regular Army now serving at home and abroad—has been awarded to Musician J. H. Keith of the Scots Guards Band. Messrs. Chappell will publish this March, which they have appropriately named 'The King's Guard.'

Obituary.

LADY THOMPSON.

LADY THOMPSON has not long outlived her distinguished husband, the late Sir Henry Thompson, Bart., the eminent surgeon. She died, we regret to record, at Headley, Surrey, on August 30, aged seventy-nine. As Kate Fanny Loder—born at Bath, August 21, 1826, and the only daughter of George and Fanny Loder—she showed great musical talent at a very tender age. She studied the pianoforte under Henry Field, and from January, 1839 to March, 1844, was a student at the Royal Academy of Music, she being twice elected a King's Scholar (in 1839 and 1841), and holding a professorship of harmony at that Institution. In 1840, at the age of fourteen, Kate Loder appeared at concerts at Bath, and in 1844, at an important concert given by Mrs. Anderson in London, she played two movements of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, the composer himself being present on that occasion. 'Little Kate Loder,' recorded the Musical World, 'executed the Adagio and Rondo from Mendelssohn's first Concerto with surprising energy and neatness.' The performers at that concert included Grisi, Mario, Lablache, Staudigl, Sivioli, Joachim (then a boy of fifteen), Piatti, and John Parry, while Costa conducted—a veritable galaxy of talent. Miss Loder's first appearance at the Philharmonic Concerts was on March 15, 1847, in Weber's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, and on March 6, 1854, she played Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, this being her last performance in public; but she continued her connection with the Academy after she had retired from the concert platform. On December 16, 1851, she married Sir (then Mr.) Henry Thompson above referred to, who died in the spring of this year.

It may not be generally known that Lady Thompson was at one time (1853) organist of St. Peter's Church, Vere Street, an appointment which doubtless caused her to compose two sets of organ pieces which have been published. According to Messrs. Brown and Stratton's 'British Musical Biography' there must also be placed to her creative credit an opera, (L'Elisir d'Amore), an overture, two string quartets, a pianoforte trio, sonatas for pianoforte and violin, solos for violin, &c.

In recent years Lady Thompson was afflicted with paralysis. One who knew her wrote recently of her as 'the beloved centre of her home to children and friends. Her spirit rose superior to bodily ailments.' The writer continues: 'She kept up a lively interest in everything concerning her husband and children and the good of mankind. She worked heartily for the poor, as well as entertaining friends in Wimpole Street; her talent and accomplishments always kept her in touch with musicians, and not only did she give excellent musical parties, but with her large-hearted benevolence Lady Thompson herself gave lessons in music to young students who were too poor to pay fees to ordinary teachers. Altogether Lady Thompson is an example to all who had the privilege of her friendship, of patience, utter unselfishness, and bright endeavour to make the best of trials.' The memory of the just is blessed.

MR. PERCY BETTS.

We regret to record the sudden death at his residence, Temple Chambers, Victoria Embankment, on August 27, of THOMAS PERCIVAL MILBOURNE BETTS, aged fifty-three. 'Percy Betts'—to adopt the name by which he was so well known—had long been a prominent member of the musical press. The genial journalist formerly wrote for the Figaro, using the pen-name 'Cherubino,' and for twenty years, in succession to the late Mr. Lincoln, he was music critic on the staff of the Daily News, wherein his brightly-written Friday column was always appreciated. He also contributed the weekly article on music in Truth, and was the London representative, in regard to music and the drama, of the Glasgow Herald, telegraphing nightly to that important newspaper and contributing thereto week by week a column of musical gossip. Furthermore, he contributed to the Graphic and was editor of the Music Trades Review. With all these irons in the fire it need hardly be said that Percy Betts was not an idle man. A journalist of extraordinary energy and a capital raconteur, he will be remembered withal as a kind-hearted man and true friend.

Sir Edward Elgar. By Robert J. Buckley. Vol. ii. of Living Masters of Music, edited by Rosa Newmarch.

[John Lane.]

Mr. Buckley has written the Life of Sir Edward Elgar with all the breezy enthusiasm of a whole-hearted hero-worshipper. The book is more critical than biographical—in the proportion of 52 to 88 pages. The incidents of the distinguished musician's career therein set forth are not much more fully stated than in the Biographical Sketch of Sir Edward that appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of October, 1900, the material for which he was kind enough to personally supply. A brief chapter entitled 'Edward Elgar To-day' gives some amusing and interesting personalia, from which we learn that Miss Marie Hall told the author 'how much she owed to Edward Elgar, who took her up when she was nine, and gave her lessons at his home.' Mr. Buckley adds, 'a fact strangely ignored by Miss Hall's biographers': surely not purposely, but because they knew it not. The book, which contains ten illustrations, is skilfully compiled, and as Mr. Buckley, able journalist that he is, has the supreme faculty of being able to interest his readers, he is sure to have a large audience in the perusal of his cleverly written and entertaining pages.

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Allegretto. For Violin and Pianoforte. By W. Wolstenholme. A Northern Cradle Song. For Violin and Pianoforte.

By Otto Manns, Jun.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Wolstenholme's Allegretto is an engaging little piece. It presents no great difficulty to the player, and is agreeably written for the solo instrument; moreover it possesses happy qualities of lightness and gaiety, associated with skilful and musical resource, which will serve to make the piece both pleasing to the pupil and interesting to the teacher.

A Northern Cradle Song, by Otto Manns, Jun., is a charming melody, deftly and sympathetically harmonized. It has two subjects: the first an Allegretto in G minor; the second a Lullaby, principally accompanied on the dominant pedal. Nothing in its way could be more finished than this little solo; it is admirably suited for the violin, viola, or violoncello, and separate arrangements have been published for all these instruments.

PART-SONGS.

Cradle Song. By Arthur Stenz.

Hark! How the birds do sing. By Herbert W. Wareing.

The Hero's rest. By Peter Cornelius.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Cradle songs, unlike the occupants of cradles, can never grow old, for their associations are too tender and their raison d'être must always exist. The example before us is a very pleasing specimen. Each of the two verses starts and ends pianissimo with fascinating delicacy, and it would be a very bad baby indeed that refused to be soothed by such dulcet strains. The tenor part is particularly melodious, and is so favoured that if the composer intended the soprano to represent Mamma, the tenor must certainly be Papa; this is evidently apparent.

It is good to meet with a modern madrigal, and Dr. Wareing is to be congratulated on his success in the historic form. He has appropriately gone to the seventeenth century for his text, selecting lines by George Herbert, which happily provide the change from gay to grave for the central section. The opening and closing portions are very bright, their exuberance being accentuated by the section in the relative minor, wherein the poet declares that while man's joys are double those of the animate world, 'so is his trouble.' Although the part-writing is of course contrapuntal in style, it is by no means difficult.

Peter Cornelius's setting of Ludwig Uhland's ballad Die Vätergruft cannot be too widely known, and the present edition, with excellent English text, entitled The Hero's rest, by the Rev. Canon Gorton, is particularly acceptable. A good sepulchral bass is necessary to do full justice to the solo part, and the chorus (S.T.B.B.) should endeavour to make believe that they are dignified ghosts with pedigrees. These conditions being fulfilled, the singers may feel confident of sending cold shivers down the backs of their listeners.

Memoirs of the Royal Artillery Band: its origin, history and progress. By Henry George Farmer. With fourteen illustrations.

[Boosey and Company.]

The author of this interesting book—who is a Bombardier in the band of which he writes—begins the preface thereto with these sentences:

‘A History of British Military Music is much needed.’ So said The Musical Times some six or seven years ago; and to-day, when military music and military bands are so much discussed, a work of this kind appears to be urgently called for. This volume, however, makes no pretence whatever to supply the want, but merely claims to be a history of one of the famous bands in the service, that of the Royal Artillery. The records of this band date as far back as 1762, when it was formed, and I doubt if there is another band in the army with a continuous history for so long a period. It was the first regimental band to be officially recognised and provided for in the Army Estimates, and may therefore justly claim to be the pioneer band of the British Army, whilst its history may fairly be stated to represent the growth of the military band in this country.

This is very modestly put; but although Mr. Farmer ‘makes no pretence’ to supply a history of British military music, the opening pages of his book give a succinct ‘account of the rise of military music in England,’ and in a manner which shows a considerable amount of original research.

Coming to the main purport of these ‘Memoirs’ we find that the earliest mention of music or of a musician in the Royal Artillery is given in the year 1557, when in a list of the army despatched to St. Quentin, a ‘drumme’ and a ‘phife’ were employed, at one shilling each per diem, for the ‘Traigne of Artillery.’ No drummer or other musicians are shown upon the establishment of the ‘Royal Regiment of Artillery’ when the famous corps was founded on May 26, 1716; but in 1720 His Most Gracious Majesty King George I. ‘was pleased to authorize an alteration in the establishment of the two companies (permanently established at Woolwich), and we find that two drummers, at one shilling each per diem, were attached to each company.’ Thus we get at the foundation of one of the most famous bands in the service—four drummers! Later on, in 1747, a regimental order directs the kettle-drummer ‘to mount the kettledrum carriage every night half-an-hour before the sun sett, and beat till gun firing.’ The Royal Artillery claims to have been the first Regiment in the British Army to employ fifers in addition to drummers, a custom brought from Flanders in the year 1747. Three years earlier a Drum-Major was borne upon the establishment of the Cadet company, the first bearing the name of John Hollingshed. He seems to have been indispensable, as he was recalled from the regiment in Flanders by the following peremptory order:

Woolwich, 16th June, 1747.

To COLONEL BELFORD,

All our Drummers being at present boys, and three of them lately entered [enlisted], the General desires that you will order the Drum-Major to England, as we have nobody here [who] can instruct them to beat.

The modern Military Band hails from Germany, where the military genius and musical leanings of Frederick the Great caused him to take the lead in establishing on a recognised model this important adjunct to the army. A start was made when King Frederick constituted the first band, with two hautboys, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons, an ‘establishment’ which long remained the rule not only in Germany but in other European countries.

As stated above the Royal Artillery Band was founded in 1762, and its origin, rise, and progress are most admirably set forth in Mr. Farmer’s pages. The temptation to quote therefrom must be resisted; but as showing the lighter side—also the darker side—of the subject we may refer to the trio of black men who ebonized, as it were, military music a century ago. These musicians of colour played instruments of percussion—the bass drum, cymbals, and “Jingling Johnnie”—as they marched in front of the regiment, ‘performing all sorts of contortions and evolutions whilst playing their instruments.’ The lack of uniformity in so uniformed an organization as the army is exemplified in an incident at the close of the Crimean war. At the Queen’s Birthday parade held at Varna in 1854, our bands collectively played the National Anthem, not only in independent arrangements, but in different keys! And this cacophony before the Staff of the allied armies! No wonder those jarring sounds were much commented upon and that the Duke of Cambridge ‘was evidently much impressed’—rather, we should say, very much depressed. One of the Duke’s first orders, when he became Commander-in-Chief, was that ‘God save the Queen’ should always be played in the key of B flat. But even the slow process of War Office reform manifested itself in this attempt at uniformity, as each bandmaster used his own peculiar harmonies, running bass parts, &c., so that while the key (B flat) was adhered to, according to the regulations, when the National Anthem was played by massed bands the harmony was not very harmonious. A regulation harmonized edition for infantry and cavalry is, however, now in use.

In the course of his 200 pages Mr. Farmer furnishes much information on a branch of music that is comparatively little known. If only other members of British military bands were as industrious, researchful, and painstaking as this Bombardier, we should have the nucleus of a complete history of military music in this country. We have nothing but praise for the book.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Faerie Suite. For the Pianoforte. By Bernard Johnson.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

This Faerie Suite furnishes a gay and sparkling set of three pieces for pianoforte solo. No. 1, entitled Elves, is a bright and rhythmic movement somewhat reminiscent of the Morris Dance of bygone days; No. 2, Fays, is a graceful dance in which the first subject is agreeably contrasted with an episode in valse rhythm; while No. 3, Goblins, is a distinctly characteristic movement—indeed, one could almost guess its title from listening to the music. A fair amount of technical skill and deftness of fingering will be required of the performer in order to give these pieces their full effect, but they will well repay the time spent upon their study.

Musical Festivals.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS.)

GLOUCESTER.

THE 181ST MEETING OF THE THREE CHOIRS.

I always think that the old standing of the Three Choirs Festival has an eloquent testimony in an explanatory note that appears in the general programme each year, not only in its bare statement of fact, but in its quaintly precise wording, which in the case of the recent Festival in Gloucester ran thus: ‘Being the One Hundred and Eighty-first Meeting of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans of Clergymen of the Three Dioceses.’ No wonder that there is local pride in an institution by far the oldest of all existing ones of its kind, and little doubt lest it should be suffered to collapse before adverse criticisms, though these may do good in keeping up the tone of reverence and earnestness that should be associated with a cathedral Festival.

From an artistic point of view, one that chiefly concerns me, such Festivals do good in their respective localities by setting a high standard of performance, especially as regards the familiar classics, which in their turn may be said to contribute indirectly to the excellence of performance of other works, since these can only be more or less adequately rehearsed by leaving ‘The Messiah,’ ‘Elijah,’ and the ‘Hymn of Praise’ to take their chance, as they had to do in the full rehearsals of the present Festival. It is, however, when we turn to the production of new works and the revival of rarely-heard masterpieces, that we can best test the artistic vitality of a Festival. In this respect Gloucester may be said to have stood the test triumphantly, since no fewer than eight composers were able to introduce new works at the Festival under notice. Even at the opening service on September 4—a distinctly popular function, at which a congregation of nearly 6,000 was present—three novelties were heard. The anthem was by Mr. John E. West, who may well have been invited to contribute on the score of the deserved success of the impressive Festival Anthem he wrote for the corresponding occasion in 1901. 'A Song of Zion,' which he conducted at this year's Festival, is less distinctively church music than its predecessor, for the composer has evidently been inspired by the words of the Hebrew Psalm, 'Arise, O Lord, into Thy resting place' (Psalm 132), to suggest the glitter of Oriental pageantry, and brass and percussion are greatly in evidence. Apart from this touch of exuberance the work has power and dignity, and contains many effective choral climaxes. At the same service a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was brought forward by Mr. Ivor Atkins, the Worcester Cathedral organist, who, like Mr. West, had shown his fitness by a previous effort of the kind, having composed a set of Canticles for the Hereford Festival of last year. The later setting is less distinctively Anglican church music and is freer in character, but has dignity as well as emotional expressiveness. It is melodious, too, without being in the least sugary, and there is withal a certain refinement and distinction in the music that makes it eminently suited for church use. The orchestration shows a decided advance, and in the introduction to the Nunc dimittis the muted strings are very charmingly employed. Yet another novelty introduced at this opening service was a series of Symphonic Variations by Mr. J. W. G. Hathaway, entitled The Chimes, the subject being a tune which Dr. Hayes invented for the Gloucester chimes, and which one might hear at stated intervals during the Festival week. It is a piece of earnest, dignified music, perhaps rather too uniformly heavily orchestrated, but thoroughly interesting.

The chief novelty of the Festival was, of course, Sir Hubert Parry's important work, 'The Love that casteth out Fear,' or, as it was originally, and, I think, more happily entitled, 'The One Thing that availeth.' Some account of this cantata, or 'Sinfonia Sacra' as the composer styles it, has already appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES (at p. 598 supra), so that I am spared the necessity of attempting a detailed description. Sir Hubert Parry has always been conspicuous for his careful choice of subjects of the highest ideality and of literary distinction, and of this the present work is a striking instance. The poem, for so I incline to call it, consists partly of Scriptural extracts, partly of the composer's own verse, which, in its simple dignity of expression, in its free rhythm, and—save for one striking and effective exception—in the absence of jingling rhymes, is perfectly suited to the purpose. The subject, man's inherent frailty, made perfect by the force of Divine Love, is an abstract one, illustrated, however, by examples—Moses, David, and Peter—that supply a concrete element in the work. In both character and form the libretto seems to me an almost ideal one. Its lofty idealism is suited to the spirit of the most idealistic of the arts; its simple, logical argument leading to a momentous conclusion, suggests a fine series of crises, along which one proceeds to a strong and forcible culmination. The music is well thought out, absolutely appropriate in its expression, and as earnest, dignified, and, at the same time, tender, as the subject demands. What to me, at least, seems wanting is a touch of the sensuous beauty of melody and colouring that would give it a greater warmth. Without affecting the unrestrained emotionalism which is natural to composers of Latin or Slavonic races, there is the more reticent and deeply felt emotion typical of the Teutonic temperament, of which Brahms, in his German Requiem, affords so noble an example, and one, too, quite in accord with Sir Hubert Parry's own individuality.

'The Love that casteth out Fear' had the advantage of an admirable performance, perhaps the best which any of its composer's works have met with on their introduction. The principals, Miss Muriel Foster and Mr. Plunket Greene, were in perfect sympathy with their task, and while the chorus sang with power, the effect of the semi-chorus—the 'mystic' choir—stationed in the Choir at the back of the orchestra was most beautiful, the fine acoustics of the Cathedral lending wonderful charm to the sound. In hardly any other cathedral could such an effect be produced.

Mr. A. Herbert Brewer's oratorio, 'The Holy Innocents,' was of interest, not only in itself, but as affording a measure of the advance made by the composer. It is based on a well-contrived libretto written by Mr. Joseph Bennett, telling the story of the massacre instigated by Herod in dramatic form, save for a brief prologue for the soprano soloist and an epilogue for soprano solo and chorus. The music, while showing the melodic facility which Mr. Brewer has always possessed, furnishes in addition ample evidence of a riper musicianship and maturer feeling. The texture of the music is stronger, the expression more virile, and there is a far greater freedom of style. Representative themes are freely employed, and more consistently than is often the case, and the orchestration is effective and appropriate. The accomplishment shown in the music is great, and if we may look for any further advance it is chiefly in the direction of a greater intensity of expression, a suggestion of the inevitableness that marks a masterpiece in art. As regards the performance, over-anxiety led to a slip on the part of the semi-chorus, but otherwise full justice was done to the work, Madame Albani, Miss Muriel Foster, Messrs. John Coates, Ffrangcon-Davies, and Dalton Baker forming an exceptionally strong cast of soloists.

Mr. Granville Bantock's new work, 'The Time Spirit,' a rhapsody for chorus and orchestra, proved one of the most interesting things in the Festival. Mr. Bantock is an acknowledged master of the orchestra, and by its aid he succeeds in establishing an atmosphere that intensifies the mood of the poem, for which Helen F. Bantock is responsible. There is melodic charm and genuine poetic feeling in this beautiful work, as well as the brilliance of colour which the composer always has at his command. It is exacting music, but not ungrateful to the executant, and under Mr. Bantock's direction an excellent performance was given. In strongly contrasted style was Mr. C. Lee Williams's 'Festival Hymn,' since the composer has here gone back to the old style of a capella music, which is peculiarly in keeping with the quaint diction of the seventeenth century poem by Jeremy Taylor. It is a piece of sound and agreeable vocal counterpoint, not without dignity, and bringing out the quality of a large mass of voices very happily.

The last novelty to be reviewed was of lighter calibre, an orchestral fantasia entitled 'Scenes from the Ballet,' by Mr. W. H. Reed, who was one of the first violins in the orchestra. It is tuneful music, exceedingly well constructed and brilliantly orchestrated, if perhaps rather too heavily for a piece of its character. A rather lighter hand might certainly have been advisable, but in the Shire Hall, where the miscellaneous concert took place, delicacy of effect is not easy of attainment.

Sir Charles Stanford's Te Deum, written in 1897 in commemoration of the sixty years of Queen Victoria's reign, has not, I think, been heard more than three or four times since its first performance at Leeds. It was therefore well deserving of a revival, for it is a powerful, brilliant, admirably constructed work, 'effective' in the best sense of a word that one often uses with an intent not quite complimentary. Intense feeling may not be perceptible, but the note of jubilation which one has a right to expect in a Te Deum is happily caught. The performance, conducted by the composer, was of marked all-round excellence.

Sir Edward Elgar's oratorio 'The Apostles,' given for the first time—and on the first opportunity, be it added—at a Three Choirs Festival, furnished a remarkable proof of the composer's popularity. The congregation was the largest mustered during the week: 2,784, as against 2,324 for 'Elijah' on the opening day, which suggests that many people had reserved themselves for a work the discussion about which has doubtless roused great curiosity. They were rewarded by an exceedingly good performance, the choral portions being exceptionally well done. Madame Albani, Miss Muriel Foster, Messrs. John Coates and Ffrangcon-Davies resumed their original parts; Mr. Dalton Baker took that of St. Peter, and Mr. Plunket Greene gave an intense and dramatic reading of the part of Judas, the great scene of his remorse being made most vivid, and indeed terrible in its impressiveness. Sir Edward Elgar conducted also his new overture 'In the South (Alassio)' at the evening concert, when its tremendous vitality and vigour made a great effect, and, at a cathedral performance, the orchestral piece comprising the Prelude and Angel's Farewell from 'Gerontius.' Dr. C. H. Lloyd's well-written Organ Concerto in F minor, composed for the Gloucester Festival of 1895, was another of the works by native musicians, the solo part being very brilliantly played by Dr. Sinclair, its original exponent.

Among the other noteworthy things in the programme were the German Requiem of Brahms, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and the Allegretto and Finale from Brahms's First Symphony, the last-named sympathetically played at the opening service, and seeming exactly suited to the occasion, while the 'Parsifal' Prelude formed an even more obviously appropriate introduction to Wednesday morning's performance in the Cathedral, this being, if I am not mistaken, the first occasion on which Mr. Brewer has introduced any of Wagner's music into a Gloucester Festival programme. The programme was indeed both comprehensive and interesting, though the omission of Bach was unfortunate. One of his fine Church Cantatas might surely have found a place in the scheme. For the sake of making the record complete, I may add that, as usual, 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' and 'The Hymn of Praise' were given, in addition to a well-arranged Handel selection. To the principal vocalists already mentioned must be added the names of Madame Hilda Wilson, Madame Sobrino, Madame Emily Squire, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Frederic Austin.

Mr. Brewer's share in the work was a heavy one, and his success deserves all the greater measure of praise. He is now a capital all-round conductor, possessing a ready command over his resources and a thorough knowledge of his work. To his advice we may safely attribute in a large measure the excellence of the programme; to his ability and discretion the artistic success and absence of friction that characterised its translation into action. The chorus was one of the strongest I have ever heard at a Three Choirs Festival, and this is the more satisfactory since it was entirely of local origin, being supplied by the Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford Festival Societies. The band, led by Mr. Burnett, was a thoroughly efficient one, and Dr. Sinclair of Hereford and Mr. Ivor Atkins of Worcester shared between them the duties of organist.

At a meeting of the Stewards of the Festival, Mr. P. Barrett Cooke, the excellent Secretary, announced that the sum of £1,500 was available for the benefit of the Charity.

CARDIFF.

The Cardiff Musical Festival has passed through perilous times, but it would seem that its promoters are not men who are easily beaten, for they persevere in spite of the lukewarmness which is almost worse than opposition, and I fancy there is a chance that this year their efforts may meet with success. The last Festival, it may be remembered, took place only two years ago; but as it then clashed most awkwardly with the neighbouring Festival of Bristol, it was wisely determined to antedate the next meeting—that is, the present one under notice—by a year.

Accordingly 1904 was fixed upon, and the Fourth Cardiff Festival began on Wednesday, September 21, in a manner which augured a successful event. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' made a popular opening, and served to show the qualities of the chorus of about 270 voices—a chorus neither very large nor very strong, but having a certain vocal charm and refinement quite distinctive. The tenors were exceptionally good, their tone was velvety and never forced, and their production easy.

At this initial concert the first novelty was introduced, Mr. Edward German conducting a 'Welsh Rhapsody' written for the occasion. It is based on Welsh folk-songs, the beauty of which is universally acknowledged, and the fine thematic material thus provided is employed by Mr. German with almost more than his usual happiness. The charm of the tunes helps to give distinction to the music, and the fancy and ingenuity with which they are woven into an artistic whole shows us the composer in his most agreeable vein. As a striking illustration I would cite the scherzo-like episode based on 'Hunting the Hare' and 'The Bells of Aberdovey,' snatches of which are presented in every conceivable way, and wrought into the texture of the movement without seeming to be forced into it. The 'March of the Men of Harlech' serves as the subject of a peroration which is more obvious in form, but not the less effective or exciting, and the immediate impression upon an impressionable Welsh audience may be easily imagined, especially when the music was conducted with the energy and vitality which Mr. German possesses.

The 'Samson and Delilah' of Saint-Saëns formed the programme of Wednesday evening's concert, and the main feature of a good all-round performance was Miss Muriel Foster's fine impersonation of the heroine. Her voice proved equal to the great demands made upon its range, colour, and expressive capacity, and she gave the right sense of seductive languor to the strains by which she bewitches Samson—a character represented by Mr. Ben Davies.

The 'Dream of Gerontius,' given on Thursday afternoon, proved once again the popularity of Sir Edward Elgar's work by attracting an audience that crowded the hall to the doors, near which many enthusiasts were content to stand. The chorus had hardly a sufficiently weighty calibre to do full justice to the work, and the semi-chorus was by no means satisfactory; but the principals, Miss Muriel Foster, Messrs. John Coates, Ffrangcon-Davies, and Ivor Foster, formed as good a cast as one could desire, or perhaps attain. At this concert the second of the Festival novelties came to a hearing. This was an orchestral piece entitled 'In the East,' composed by Mr. Arthur Hervey, whose success as a composer at the last Cardiff Festival (1902) has doubtless led to a renewed invitation. Mr. Hervey has given a thoroughly Oriental colour and fanciful charm to his music by the employment of melodies the tonality of which is distinctively Eastern, and has worked them into a most effective piece, varied in colour, and containing many striking climaxes. The orchestration shows many happy touches, which were the more apparent since the composer is, as many composers are not, a capital conductor. The 'Tod und Verklärung' of Richard Strauss was played at this concert.

At the evening concert on Thursday two unfamiliar works were given, separated by Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, of which a brilliant reading was given by Miss Adela Verne. Massenet's 'Eve' was the first, and the greater part of Schumann's 'Faust' music formed the second of these choral works. 'Eve' made upon me the impression of being purely artificial music, without an atom of real feeling from beginning to end, but simply a search for trumpety effects, in which gong, and harp, and all the paraphernalia of the skilled orchestral writer are brought into play. It is, I am told, nearly thirty years since it was first produced, and I cannot wonder that it has had to wait so long for introduction to this country, but rather I wonder that it has even now found acceptance. Of Schumann's 'Faust' music one occasionally hears the Third Part, but seldom the earlier portions, and, though these are less distinguished, the opportunity of listening to them was not unwelcome—but Schumann's music unfortunately came far too late in the evening for due appreciation. Madame Blauvelt, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Ivor Foster were among the large cast of soloists.

On Friday morning Verdi's 'Requiem' afforded the chorus an opportunity of distinction, of which they availed themselves to the full, singing most brilliantly. The vocal character of the music, and its emotional feeling, seemed to suit the Cardiff singers admirably, and the result was an exceptionally fine performance, to which the quartet of principals—Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Messrs. Coates and Ffrangcon-Davies—contributed largely. The 'Requiem' was preceded by the 'Parsifal' Prelude, and followed by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

In the evening came one of the chief novelties of the Festival, a setting of Cowper's ballad 'John Gilpin,' for chorus and orchestra, by Dr. Cowen. As one might expect, it is a brilliantly clever jeu d'esprit, in which not a point is lost the humour of which can in any way be emphasized by the music. Dr. Cowen's extreme facility in writing for the orchestra has enabled him to make the fullest use of its resources, and he does so in a manner so lavish as to make one wish at times that he had exercised a little more restraint in the application of 'local colour.' The headlong course of the hero is admirably depicted, and the braying of the ass that started Gilpin's steed on its homeward journey is humorously realistic, while after the breathless ride the breadth of the last verse, 'Now let us sing, long live the King,' is grateful, and forms an admirable Coda. The humour is not by any means confined to the orchestra, but extends to the voice parts, which are highly suggestive, without being unvoiced, as was shown by the spirit with which they were sung at the very successful début of the work, which should follow the example of its hero in making a speedy progress through the country. At this same concert the whole of the Third Act of 'Lohengrin' was given, the fine singing of the love duet by Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Ben Davies being a feature deserving mention, as was their performance of the closing scene from Act I. of 'Die Walküre.'

At Saturday afternoon's concert a new cantata by a young composer of the district, Mr. Harry Evans, entitled 'The Victory of St. Garmon,' was brought to a hearing. If it be the function of a provincial Festival to encourage budding composers by giving them a chance of a hearing, the commission given to Mr. Evans must be held to be justified, though one cannot go so far as to allow that on its absolute merits the cantata was quite worthy of the occasion. What can be said of it is that, as the first important work of a young and, as I am told, self-taught musician, it shows abundant promise. The faults of the music—its crudity and roughness—are the obvious effects of inexperience; its great merit is that it gives abundant evidence of high ideal and strenuous purpose. One feels convinced that the composer has something to say, there are gleams of originality, and even distinction, that appear from time to time in the work, and what is chiefly wanting is the technical equipment that will enable him to fully express himself instead of groping after a correct expression. Thus the themes have often an undoubted character of their own, but they are awkwardly phrased, and do not fit the correct declamation of the words; and again, while there are many happy touches of orchestral colour, they are patchy in effect, and the composer resembles a painter who uses a great number of tints, often well chosen, but has not achieved the art of colouring, and cannot, therefore, secure an harmonious whole.

I ought perhaps to mention, though some description of the cantata has already appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES, that the libretto, by Mr. H. Elvet Lewis, deals with the so-called Alleluia battle, fought in the fifth century between the invading Picts and a smaller force of natives, led by St. Garmon, whose device of making his men rush out of ambush with the cry 'Alleluia!' so intimidated the enemy that they fled in a panic. The story is effectively told in simple flowing verse, lending itself well to musical treatment. The chorus are the narrators, but St. Garmon's prayer on the eve of the battle is given to a baritone soloist, and was sung on this occasion by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies with fitting earnestness. The reception of the cantata was most enthusiastic, and should be taken by the composer as an encouragement to fulfil the promise which his first effort undoubtedly displays.

There was at this concert a very interesting revival of Felicien David's Symphonic Ode 'The Desert,' which is more read of than heard in these days, yet deserves resuscitation. The choral writing is not very interesting, but how difficult it seems to give character to music for a male-voice choir! The two tenor songs, on the other hand, conjure up something like an atmosphere, and the dance music is quaint and refined. With Mr. Coates as soloist, and Miss Henrietta Cowen's clear elocution in the part of reciter, a very pleasant impression was made by the work. As a pendant to it we had the charming overture and incidental music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' in which Mendelssohn's genius is at its highest level. The portions of the play for which 'melodram' is written were most effectively recited by Miss Cowen, and 'Ye spotted snakes' was prettily sung by Madame Drinkwater and Miss Sambrook. Miss Adela Verne's brilliant performance of the solo part in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia for Pianoforte and Orchestra was the remaining feature of a very interesting programme. The Festival was brought to an end by a performance of 'Elijah,' in which Miss Ada Crossley made her only appearance during the Festival.

On the whole, I think that the Cardiff Festival of 1904 marks an advance. The programme was of varied and well-sustained interest, the performances under Dr. Cowen's painstaking direction, reached a high level of efficiency, and the chorus, trained by Madame Clara Novello Davies, Mr. T. E. Aylward, and Mr. J. E. Deacon displayed good material and abundant enthusiasm, though in point of weight, especially in the bass section, and in power of sustaining the pitch, it is still capable of improvement. The mention of pitch reminds me that the vocalists were often obviously embarrassed by the high pitch, which is still retained at Cardiff, and it may be suggested that one of the greatest improvements that can be effected is to adopt the now almost universal 'diapason normal' before another Festival comes round. Public interest in the event seems to be greater than it used to be at Cardiff, and I am glad to learn that at last there is a prospect of expenses being covered by receipts. The organization was excellent, and the smoothness with which all the arrangements worked reflects much credit on the hard-working committee.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

This great Welsh gathering took place at Rhyl on September 6, 7, 8 and 9. It presented all the usual features, a heterogeneous programme, large first-prizes in the choral classes, great crowds at the chief musical events, occasional excitement, and throughout evidences of strong national feeling. The musical results exhibited were often remarkably good, but on the whole it cannot be said that they showed any advance on the previous year's excellent record at Llanelli. In one respect at least the good example of Llanelli in setting as part of the tests in the chief choral class a whole section of an oratorio instead of a chorus or two was not followed. It is, however, very much to the credit of the management that they brought forward two new and elaborate compositions by Welsh composers, but it is to be regretted that this encouragement to native art was not combined with the presentment of some masterpiece by a modern composer. It is true that Gounod's 'Redemption' was given, but a great deal has happened since that work was written.

Six choirs had entered for the Small Mixed-Voice Choir section, but only three appeared. The performance of the Nantlle Vale Choir, under Mr. T. T. Powell, roused the enthusiasm of the audience and gained for the singers the first prize. An audience of ten thousand persons assembled on the occasion of the contest for the chief choral prize of £200. It is not a little remarkable that of the four choirs, of between 150 and 175 voices each that appeared in this class, only one was Welsh. The test-pieces were the choruses 'How dark, O Lord, are Thy decrees' (Handel) and 'Come with torches' (Mendelssohn) (how often during the last thirty years has this chorus done duty as a test-piece!), and the unaccompanied part-song 'Sleep, my beloved' (J. H. Roberts). The result was a victory for one of the English choirs, the North Staffordshire District Choral Society, under Mr. J. Whewell, who thus for the third time led his forces to triumph. The Welsh Choir (the Mid-Rhondda United Choir), under Mr. Ted Hughes, sang remarkably well and was awarded a second place, but no prize. The other choirs were the Hanley and District Choral Society, under Mr. James Garner, and the West Lancashire Choral Society, under Mr. H. Bemey. It is to the credit of the audience, with all its natural sympathy for compatriots and natural disappointment at defeat, that the verdict was accepted as just.

The Male-Voice Choir contest also drew a large audience. Seven choirs sang, one coming from the Isle of Man. There were three Welsh and three English choirs. Two choirs stood out from the rest—the famous Manchester Orpheus Society, under Mr. Nesbitt, and the Cardiff Choir, under Mr. Roderick Williams. The first place was won by the Cardiff men after a remarkably fine contest. The test-pieces were 'The Son of God' (Jenkins), and 'The King of Worlds' (A. Dard-Janin). The result, of course, gave great satisfaction to the Welsh folk.

In the Ladies' Choir section there was some highly-refined singing. Four choirs appeared, and the first place was divided between the Llanbadrach Choir and the Manx Choir. The test-pieces were 'The Spanish Gipsy Girl' (Lassen), 'Sweet balmy days of Spring' (Mackenzie), and 'Gentle bird' (D. Emlyn Evans).

The orchestral section attracted only two bands, the Rhondda Society, conducted by Mr. Percy Smith, and the Wrexham Society, conducted by Mr. W. S. Stephenson. The test-piece was Cherubini's Overture, 'Anacreon.' All the performers had to be amateurs. The Rhondda Band won the £25 prize. The members of this band are mostly colliers. If the National Eisteddfod exists to lead and not merely to meekly follow a stream that leads nowhere, it should subsidize every band that has the spirit to attend such a competition. Can it be claimed that the offer year by year of a £200 money prize to one choral organization has done very much for musical progress in Wales? The same sum spent every year in encouraging orchestral organizations in Wales would surely accomplish more for the art and the nation.

The solo-singing competitions brought forward the usual large number of singers. The successful competitors were: soprano, Miss Jennie Ellis; contralto, Miss Lily Fairnley; tenor, Mr. David Ellis; baritone, Mr. Geo. A. Llewellyn and Mr. Tom Lewis; and bass, Mr. Robert Hughes. The Royal Oakley Band gained the chief prize in the brass band section. The adjudicators were Dr. Cummings, Mr. David Jenkins, Mr. Emlyn Evans, and Mr. C. Francis Lloyd.

Two new works by Welsh composers were produced at the evening concert: 'Job,' an oratorio, by Mr. David Jenkins, and 'Captivity,' an oratorio, by Mr. Emlyn Evans. Both composers are musicians of considerable experience, and Mr. Jenkins in particular has for many years given much of his time to composition. His new work is the ripest exemplification of his style. He is at his best in choral writing, but in the new oratorio he also shows freedom in the use of the orchestra, and generally his music is fluent, appropriate, and expressive. Mr. Emlyn Evans's work was received by the large audience with considerable enthusiasm. The choruses are the strongest point of the writing. The oratorio is designed for use by societies that cannot command extensive resources. No doubt it will be popular in Wales if it does not find its way to a larger circle. On page 651 will be found some particulars of both the above composers and their new works. Gounod's 'Redemption' was also performed at one of the concerts.

The Eisteddfod was considered a success. But whether the institution accomplishes the theory of its purpose, whether it guides, directs, and initiates as it might, are moot points.

The National Eisteddfod of 1905 will be held at Carnarvon.

AN OLD-TIME COSTUME CONCERT.

Costume concerts are not customary nowadays, but an eighteenth-century instance of a benefit concert of a somewhat novel character—the performers being 'dressed up'—is to be found in an advertisement in the Daily Journal of February 25, 1732. It reads thus:—

At the desire of some Foreign Ministers.

For the benefit of Mr. Angel and Mr. Cook.

At the Theatre-Royal in Lincolns-Inn-Fields, this present Friday, being the 25th of February, will be perform'd

A Concert of VOCAL and INSTRUMENTAL MUSICK

By the Best Hands.

In the manner as it was perform'd at Dresden, by the King of Poland's command.

The Performers are to be in the Character as follows:—The Harpsichord by Colombine, Violoncello by Harlequin, Basson by Scaramouch, Double Bass by Pierot, Singing by Diana and an Indian King, Violins by a Spaniard, a Roman, an Hungarian, a Persian, a Turk, a Polander, an Arabian, a Muscovite: the Tenor by a Highlander, the German Flute by a Satyr, French Horns by Forresters, two Shepherds Hautboys, and others.

The Concert of Performers will consist of between 40 and 50 of the best Hands.

Places will be kept on the Stage for Gentlemen and Ladies performers, who are willing to play between the Acts, in proper Habits as they please.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The novelties that have been performed at these concerts include a new suite entitled 'Halloween' by Mr. Charles Macpherson, sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, and produced on August 27. This clever work, based on a theme that would naturally and strongly appeal to the imaginative temperament of a Scotsman, testifies to Mr. Macpherson's ripe musicianship, his extensive knowledge of the orchestra and his earnestness of purpose. Of its various sections the fifth, a Romance, is a specially attractive movement, containing some effective and significant writing, and the sixth and last number is brilliantly scored. The composer was very heartily cheered by a large audience at the close of a capital performance.

The concert on September 3 was distinguished by the first performance in London of Dr. Cowen's two charming pieces for small orchestra, respectively entitled 'Childhood' and 'Girlhood.' They are only trifles, but they are most delicately scored for small orchestra (without trumpets, trombone or drums), and their daintiness and purity, in these stressful days, are simply delightful.

A work of serious design was introduced on September 6, a Symphony in A (Op. 23) by M. Paul Juon, a Russian composer, born in 1872. This composition is in the orthodox form and laid out on a large scale, but the movements, with the exception of an attractive Scherzo of romantic character, appeared to be over-developed, and the earnestness of the composer was more apparent than his power to express himself effectively. Another novelty to Londoners was a Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (Op. 7) by M. Edward Schütt, also of Russian nationality. The concerto consists of three terse and well-knit movements, of which the second possesses considerable charm and the third has a principal theme of strong, rhythmic character which is most brilliantly treated. Mr. Carl Weber was the soloist, and his playing well merited his double recall to the platform. Mention is also due of the first performance in England of two songs entitled 'Slumber Song' and 'The Sleigh of Life,' by Mr. Eugen D'Albert. The former is a gentleditty after the style of Adolf Jensen, but the latter is a spirited composition possessing strong character. They were both admirably rendered by Mrs. Henry J. Wood.

A Serenade for Flute and Strings (Op. 82), by Theodore Gouvy, was heard for the first time in this country on September 8. It proved to be a most attractive work and the flute part was played to perfection by Mr. Fransella.

Mr. Cyril Scott is so gifted a young writer that much interest attached to the production on September 10 of a Rhapsody for Orchestra (Op. 31) from his pen. He desires his work to be listened to as 'dramatic music without a drama,' albeit it is manifest that the composition was inspired by distinct ideas if not laid out on a clearly defined programme. If the work lacks repose and contrast, it is clear the composer has something to say, and thus the attention is held if at times somewhat unwillingly.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Festival Choral Society has announced Berlioz's Faust, Elgar's Dream of Gerontius and Caractacus, Horatio Parker's Hora Novissima, and a new cantata, King Conor, by Mr. Joseph H. Adams, a Birmingham composer, in addition to a revival of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. Dr. Sinclair will as heretofore conduct. The City Choral Society promise Elijah, Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha, Elgar's Dream of Gerontius, and a selection from Bach's B minor Mass. Mr. F. W. Beard retains the office of conductor.

The Societies that minister to the Saturday evening audiences in the Town Hall are issuing strong programmes. The Midland Musical Society (conductor, Mr. A. J. Cotton) intend to give Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha (Parts I. and II.), Haydn's Creation in like proportion, Elgar's Lux Christi, a work by Mendelssohn, and the annual performance (on Good Friday) of Gounod's Redemption. The Choral and Orchestral Association, directed by Mr. Joseph H. Adams, will perform Barnett's Paradise and the Peri. Elijah, The Messiah, and an operatic night complete the scheme.

The season was announced to begin on September 24 with a performance of Judas Maccabæus, to be given by the Choral Union under the conductorship of Mr. Thomas Facer. Other works to be performed by this Society are Sullivan's Golden Legend, Handel's The Messiah, and Elgar's Coronation Ode.

The Halford Concerts Society's Scheme is very important, but cannot be quoted at length. The nine Symphonies of Beethoven are to be given in their numerical order, and there is to be a Strauss Concert, conducted by the composer in person. Mr. George Halford is the musical director.

Other serial concerts include those of the Messrs. Harrison, with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, Mr. Max Mossel's drawing-room concerts, and a new series of Broadwood concerts, at which the Queen's Hall Wind Quintet and the Moscow Trio are to appear.

The annual Festival of the Sunday School Union began in the Town Hall on September 15, and was continued for a week. A cantata, by Mr. W. J. Hancock, entitled The Golden Key, was sung by a choir of 550 voices, conducted by Mr. Thomas Facer, and solos were given by Miss Marguerite Gell, Mr. Samuel Fenn, and Mr. Sheldon. Mr. C. W. Perkins, the city organist, presided at the organ.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Most of the musical societies have arranged their winter's work, and I am enabled to give a fairly complete forecast of the season. The past two seasons having been so successful, the management of the Choral and Orchestral Union announce an extended season of fifteen weeks. During that period twelve orchestral and four choral concerts will be given, and in addition the usual 'popular' choral and orchestral concerts. The Scottish Orchestra will again be led by Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, with Dr. Cowen as conductor-in-chief, the other conductors being Herr Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the famous Meiningen Orchestra, Mr. Edouard Colonne, and Mr. George Henschel. Under Mr. Joseph Bradley's baton the Choral Union will give a first performance in Scotland of Elgar's The Apostles, a repetition of The Dream of Gerontius—so well sung last year—in addition to Elijah and The Messiah.

The Pollokshields Philharmonic Society, still enthusiastic under Mr. John Cullen's direction, has in hand Sullivan's Golden Legend, which will be given in conjunction with the Scottish Orchestra. In order to stimulate interest in choral singing this enterprising Society has inaugurated a choir competition which is likely to prove successful. The St. Mungo Choir, under Mr. Golan E. Hoole, begins its second session with Parts I. and II. of Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha and Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana.

As usual with the choirs connected with religious bodies Handel finds favour, Acis and Galatea and The Messiah being the winter's programme of the Young Men's Christian Association Choir (Mr. R. L. Reid, conductor), while Samson is to be given by the Sunday School Union Choir (Mr. A. Steven, conductor).

Of societies beyond the city bounds the following arrangements are announced:—Coatbridge Choral Union, The Messiah and Cowen's Rose Maiden; Clydebank Choral Union, Macfarren's May-Day and Elijah; Vale of Leven Choral Union, Gade's Erl-King's Daughter and Samson—all three societies being under Mr. W. J. Clapperton's direction. Dumbarton Choral Union (Mr. E. C. Owston, conductor) announces Mendelssohn's St. Paul; Ayr Choral Union (Mr. Hugh McNabb, conductor), The Messiah, Elijah, and The Abbot's Bell, the last-named a new work by Mr. David Stephen; Hamilton Choral Union (Mr. T. S. Drummond, conductor), Samson.

Mr. Herbert Walton's organ recitals at the Cathedral this autumn have been very largely attended. Associated with the Cathedral organist were such distinguished executants as Dr. Peace, Mr. E. H. Lemare, and Mr. Tertius Noble. Mr. Lemare's magnificent playing on September 12 was listened to by an audience of over 1,300 persons.

Mr. David Stephen's appointment as Musical Director to the Carnegie Trust, and his consequent removal to Dunfermline, is a distinct loss to the art of music in Glasgow. The duties of the new post have not yet been defined, but whatever they may be, they will be excellently performed by a musician of Mr. Stephen's experience and attainments.

We regret to have to record the death of Mr. W. G. Martin, for twenty-five years organist and choirmaster of St. Mary's Episcopal Church. Mr. Martin, who was trained under Dr. Armes at Durham Cathedral, was an excellent church musician, and was held in the highest esteem by his professional brethren.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The forthcoming season promises to be of exceptional interest. The premier Society has announced performances of Berlioz's Faust, Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and Goring Thomas's The Swan and the Skylark, while further interest is centering in the promised performance of César Franck's Beatitudes for the first time in Liverpool. Dr. Cowen will again conduct the orchestra, Mr. H. A. Branscombe continues to be chorusmaster, and Mr. G. Broadbent remains as secretary of an organization to which he has rendered yeoman service for many years.

The Orchestral Society, formerly under the baton of the late Alfred Rodewald, will be conducted by Mr. Granville Bantock. At the first of the eight concerts Sir Edward Elgar will direct the first performance in Liverpool of his Overture In the South. Herr Sibelius will come from Finland to direct the performance of his Symphony No. 1, in E minor, on March 18 next, this being the first performance of the work in England.

Amongst the various concerts to be given in the Philharmonic Hall are three by the Welsh Choral Society and two or three by the Wesleyan Choral Union. Mr. Vasco Akeroyd again promises interesting programmes as coming from the Società Armonica, and Mr. Schiever will give Chamber Concerts. The forecasts of other Societies must be deferred till their arrangements have been completed.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Before the end of this month (October) the musical season here will be in full swing. The forty-seventh season of the Hallé Concerts opens on October 20 and continues, on succeeding Thursday evenings, till the third or fourth week in March, 1905, almost without intermission. Detailed programmes of the separate concerts are not as yet published, but some of the more important works to be given in the course of the season figure in the prospectus. The purely orchestral include Beethoven's Symphonies 1, 3, 4, 6, and third Leonora Overture; a Symphony (not specified) by Mozart; Schubert's Symphony in C; Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique; Dvorák's New World Symphony, Otello Overture, and Violoncello Concerto (soloist, Professor Hugo Becker); Brahms's third Symphony; Tchaikovsky's Pathétique; Smetana's 'Aus Böhmens Hain und Flur'; Strauss's Tod und Verklärung; and Elgar's In the South. The chief choral works are Beethoven's Fidelio; Brahms's Rhapsodie for contralto solo and male-voice chorus, and German Requiem; a Motet by Bach; Wagner's Holy Supper of the Apostles; Elgar's Gerontius and The Apostles; and of course The Messiah and Elijah. It is gratifying to note among the instrumental soloists—engaged with Dr. Richter's approval—two former pupils of the Royal Manchester College of Music, Mr. Isaacs (pianoforte) and Mr. Catterall (violin).

Next in importance to the Hallé Concerts among the musical institutions of Manchester are the Brodsky Quartet Concerts, which will again be held in the Midland Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 30, Jan. 18, Feb. 15, March 15, and April 5. As all the proceeds of these excellent concerts go to the Students' Sustentation Fund at the Royal Manchester College of Music, they deserve to be well supported.

The Gentlemen's Concerts—the oldest concert institution in Manchester and in England, dating back a century and a half—begin with an orchestral concert, conducted by Dr. Richter; at the second concert, on November 9, Miss Muriel Foster gives a vocal recital; the third is again orchestral (soloist, Mr. Santley); and the fourth takes the form of a violin and vocal recital by Messrs. Kreisler and Pedro de Zulueta. It is expected that Lady Hallé and Miss Olga Néruda will appear at one of the concerts after the New Year.

Mr. Brand Lane's Saturday Concerts with the Philharmonic Choir, of which he is conductor, consist of two oratorio and five miscellaneous evenings. Among the special attractions is the engagement of Florizel von Reuter to play the violin and to conduct one of his own orchestral compositions.

The Ladies' Concerts at the Midland Hall, managed by Messrs. Broadwood, will be resumed on October 4.

The Southport Orchestral Society, the orchestra of which, largely consisting of amateurs, does excellent work under Mr. R. H. Aldridge, announces three concerts.

It is a pity that the Blackpool Festival—one of the most flourishing of recently-established competition meetings in the North—this year coincides in date with the Leeds Festival.

MUSIC IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union exhibit in their prospectus for the coming season a continuance of their two-fold policy of progressiveness and support of British composers. Elgar's Apostles and Mackenzie's Dream of Jubal are to be given in conjunction with the Hallé Orchestra; and, under the auspices of the Choral Union, the Scottish Orchestra will give a concert, at which Cowen's Indian Rhapsody and Elgar's new Overture In the South will be two of the works performed.

The Amateur Vocal Society announce a performance of Elijah; the Postal Telegraph Society will give Handel's Judas Maccabæus and Barnett's Building of the Ship; the Philharmonic Society promises Smart's The Bride of Dunkerron, a portion of Gounod's Redemption, and Sullivan's The Martyr of Antioch; while the College of Science Choral Society will undertake Mendelssohn's Loreley.

Mendelssohn's St. Paul will be performed for the first time in its complete form in Middlesbrough by the Musical Union. Another concert will include string quartets by Professor Kruse and his colleagues and an English version of Schubert's Gott im Ungewitter, which it is thought has not been previously heard in England. At the third concert Stanford's Elgiac Ode will be sung.

The Sunderland Philharmonic Society is again in the unfortunate predicament of being compelled to suspend its activity temporarily, on account of the lack of a suitable hall. The last season produced a heavy deficit in the accounts of the South Shields Choral Society, but thanks to the generosity of the president, Mr. William Black, J.P., they are able to enter into the work of a new session with a financially 'clean slate,' and announce performances of Goring Thomas's The Swan and the Skylark, Brahms's Song of Destiny, in addition to The Messiah and Elijah. Berlioz's Faust is promised by the Bishop Auckland Musical Society. Gateshead Vocal Society will produce a quasi-novelty in this district with Handel's Jephtha and C. H. Lloyd's Hero and Leander. Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society announce Bridge's The Inchcape Rock, Hiller's Song of Victory, and Gounod's Faust, and the Blyth Philharmonic Society propose to give Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha's Wedding Feast, The Messiah, in addition to another work yet to be chosen.

On September 10 the first of a promised annual series of choral contests was inaugurated, at which male and mixed-voice choirs contested, curiously enough, for the same prize. The Consett and District Choir (mixed) were allotted the chief award, the Newcastle Glee and Madrigal Society (Male) the second, and the Darlington Male-Voice Choir the third prize.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In the approaching season music in Nottingham will be well sustained by the Sacred Harmonic Society, which has already commenced its rehearsals under Mr. Allen Gill. The works to be performed in addition to The Messiah are Elijah, The Bride of Dunkerron (Smart), Blest Pair of Sirens (Parry), and The Dream of Gerontius (Elgar). Under the same conductorship two orchestral concerts are announced, the programmes to contain Overture Youth (Hervey), Symphony Irish (Stanford), Overture Di Ballo (Sullivan), Symphony No. 5 (Tchaikovsky).

West Bridgford, a large suburb of Nottingham, has a Choral Society of its own, which is devoting its energies to a performance of Sullivan's Martyr of Antioch.

Dr. Richter is announced to give a concert, when Miss Cantelo, who has worthily upheld chamber music here, will be heard as soloist in a pianoforte concerto. Mr. Arthur Richards announces an orchestral concert in December, at which Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (soloist, Miss Hogg) and a Symphony (Haydn) will be given; and at a later date Mr. Richards promises to introduce Bach's Triple Concerto for Three Pianofortes, quite a novelty in this city.

At Boston, Elijah, and at Mansfield, Judas Maccabæus are being rehearsed, while at Leicester The Redemption is announced for the November concert, with Barnett's Ancient Mariner and Coleridge-Taylor's Wedding Feast for a later date.

The Stapleford Choral Society are rehearsing Hatton's Robin Hood for their first concert, with Gaul's Holy City and Nichol's Holy Grail to follow.

The Midland Convention of Choirmasters, held in Nottingham on September 15, 16, and 17, attracted considerable attention, and was productive of some very useful lectures. On the opening day Dr. Madeley Richardson spoke on the 'Training of the Boy's Voice,' Mr. Edward Iles gave a very practical 'Talk on the Art of Singing,' and Dr. Buck, of Harrow, devoted his allotted time to 'Music in Secondary Schools.' On the second day the audience were invited to give their attention to 'Some Psychological Points arising in a Music Lesson,' whilst Mrs. Curwen gave a paper on 'Educational Principles applied to Piano Teaching.' Dr. Dunstan, Mr. Herbert Newbold, and Mr. Venables also contributed papers of considerable interest.

The last day was devoted to subjects dealing with music as an element of the Education Departments. The whole Convention was brought to a close by Dr. Henry Watson, whose paper on 'Music and Musical Instruments of Shakespeare's Day' was the only purely literary lecture of the meeting.

On September 18, at the Harvest Festival at the Wesley Chapel, Broad Street, a successful performance was given of Gaul's Holy City. Dr. G. J. Bennett, of Lincoln Cathedral, opened the new three-manual organ at the Mansfield Road Presbyterian Church on September 22. The organ has been built by Mr. Andrews, of Bradford, to a specification of Mr. A. C. Walker's, the organist of the church.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Prospects for the forthcoming musical season are very bright. The various Societies are showing commendable enterprise in their choice of works. Several which appear in the subjoined forecast will be heard in the city for the first time.

The Sheffield Musical Union (conductor, Dr. Coward) propose to repeat its London success in Beethoven's Mass in D: the work is in full rehearsal. The Messiah in December and Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha in March, together with a visit to Leeds, complete the sum of the Union's activities for the season.

The Sheffield Amateur Musical Society (conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood and Mr. J. A. Rodgers) announce Brahms's Requiem, Wagner's Kaisermarsch, and other works. The newly-appointed conductor, Mr. Wood, will direct the concert and attend some prior rehearsals. The remaining rehearsals and the Spring Concert will be directed by the assistant conductor.

The Sheffield Choral Union (conducted by Mr. J. Duffell) is preparing Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and Mr. Duffell's new choral ballad Hohenlinden, and, for succeeding concerts, The Messiah and Bach's St. Matthew Passion.

The Heeley Musical Union (conductor, Mr. M. Tomlinson) announces St. Paul, Acis and Galatea, and Blest Pair of Sirens. As this is quite a young Society, it is well-advised in feeling its way by taking up standard works for study. The same remark can be applied to the Burngreave Choral Society (conductor, Mr. H. C. Jackson), which will perform The Creation, The Messiah, and St. Paul.

The Penistone Choral Society (under the direction of Mr. Joseph Cooper) is, after a strenuous career, now fairly established, and will this season give three concerts, at which Acis and Galatea, The Messiah, and The Hymn of Praise will be performed.

The Rotherham Choral Society (under Mr. T. Brameld's conductorship) is as enterprising as it is prosperous. The choice of Brahms's German Requiem for the first concert is a commendable one.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society (conductor, Dr. Coward) is rehearsing Coleridge-Taylor's Meg Blane and Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm for the winter concert, and The Hymn of Praise will be given in March next.

The Brincliffe Musical Society, the largest of the local orchestral organizations, promises for the first concert in December a programme exclusively made up of Mr. Edward German's compositions. It is expected that the composer will conduct.

The Sheffield Chamber Music Society, following a successful opening season, will give a second series of seven concerts, at which the Kruse Quartet, the Moscow Trio, and other combinations will perform.

Mr. A. S. Burrows has been appointed conductor of the Sheffield Male Glee and Madrigal Society in succession to Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

A musical Festival was held in the Harrogate Kursaal on August 18 and 19. In the afternoon of each day miscellaneous concerts were given, a noticeable feature being the appearance of Miss Adela Verne as solo pianist on the second day. On the evening of the 18th Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was performed, and on that of the 19th Sullivan's Golden Legend. The choir numbered 200 voices, consisting chiefly of the Harrogate Choral Society, assisted by picked voices from Bradford and York, their singing on the whole being admirable. The orchestra displayed excellent quality, but was at times too overpowering—a not unusual occurrence. The solo vocalists were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Ellen Jaxon, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. H. Brearley, and Mr. Charles Tree, all of acknowledged ability. Mr. Naylor, who conducted with discretion, deserves much credit for his skill in organising the Festival, which was at least artistically successful.

'Eisteddfod Gadeiriol, Royal Albert Hall, Llundain, Chwefror 23ain, 1905'—in other words, a 'Grand Chair Eisteddfod' is to be held in the great building at Kensington on February 23, 1905. The chief choral competition is for choirs of male voices, with the prospect of a prize of one hundred guineas. The adjudicators are Dr. Henry Coward, Mr. D. Emllyn Evans, and Mr. D. C. Williams. All information concerning this Eisteddfod may be obtained from Mr. W. H. Roberts, 10, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road.

The St. Margaret's Musical Society (Rev. Jocelyn Perkins, conductor) has recently added an orchestra to the scheme of its artistic and philanthropic operations. But it is desired to increase the number of instrumentalists, already nearly forty in number, by the addition of two oboes, two horns, one bassoon, and some more players on stringed instruments. Miss Rosalind Bridge, Litlington Tower, Westminster Abbey, is the Hon. Secretary of the Society, from whom all particulars may be obtained.

On September 3, died suddenly, LEO STERN, the distinguished violoncellist, and husband of Madame Suzanne Adams, with whom much sympathy will be felt. Mr. Stern first played Dvorák's B minor Violoncello Concerto in England at the Philharmonic Concert of March 19, 1896, with so much satisfaction to the composer that Dvorák invited the gifted interpreter to Prague, where he again played the same work within a fortnight.

The prospectus of the Winter Symphony Concerts, Bournemouth (conducted by Mr. Dan Godfrey), gives fresh proof of the enterprise which characterises these Municipal music-makings. In addition to the Monday and Thursday Classical Concerts, there will be a series of 'special composers' nights' on Tuesdays. Mr. Godfrey intends to perform 'some of the newest productions of our young British Composers'; 'but,' he cautiously adds in his forecast of the season, 'I do not propose, as a rule, to accept any of these which have not satisfactorily passed the ordeal of criticism at the Provincial Festivals or in London concert-rooms.' Verb. sap.!

The Blackpool Musical Festival is announced to take place on October 6, 7, and 8. In addition to the usual competitions three evening concerts will be given, at one of which Mr. George Rathbone's cantata Vogelweid, the Minnesinger will be performed by the combined children's choirs, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Whittaker. The adjudicators are Dr. McNaught, Mr. Percy Pitt, and Mr. R. H. Wilson.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society—conductor Mr. Arthur Fagge—announces performances of the following works at the Crystal Palace during the coming season: Lalla Rookh (Clay), The Swan and the Skylark (Goring Thomas), The Messiah (Prout's Edition), King Olaf (Elgar), Redemption (Gounod), Paradise and the Peri (Schumann), The Charge of the Light Brigade (Hecht), and The Last Post (Stanford).

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson will shortly offer for sale by auction at their Galleries in Leicester Square, the Musical and Miscellaneous Library of the late Mr. Percy Betts, the well-known musical and dramatic critic. The collection comprises many interesting and valuable works relating to the subject on which the deceased journalist was so well-informed an authority.

The South London Choral Association (Conductor, Mr. Leonard C. Venables), announces performances of Elgar's King Olaf and Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha (complete) to be given during the coming season. The work that is being carried on under the careful supervision of Mr. Venables at the South London Institute of Music, Camberwell, is deserving of all encouragement.

The prospectus of the Finsbury Choral Association shows the enterprise that characterizes the operations of this organization conducted by Mr. Allen Gill. The following works are promised to be given during the approaching winter: Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha (Parts 1 and 2), Brahms's Song of Destiny, Handel's Israel in Egypt, and Elgar's Caractacus.

The well-known Leipzig music-publishing house of D. Rahter celebrated, on August 13, the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. Many compositions by Tchaikovsky, Henselt, Richard Strauss, Schutt, Popper, Reisenauer, Meyer-Helmund and others published by this firm have attained world-wide reputation.

Mr. Warren T. Clemens has been appointed conductor of the Arbroath Choral Union in succession to Mr. David Stephen.

Mr. Herbert Withers has joined the Kruse Quartet as violoncellist in succession to Mr. Percy Such.

Answers to Correspondents.

J. H. P.—(1) 'About the speed' at which the opening chorus in Gounod's Gallia should be taken, we venture to suggest crotchet = 72; but at 'Jerusalem,' on p. 25, the music should become more animated. In the last bar of page 1, the C natural, which seems to you so unnatural, is quite natural: it is the bass of a chord much beloved by the composer. (2) For Christmas Carols 'suitable for performance by a male-voice party of eight (T.T.B.B.) in the open air, something of moderate compass, not too difficult, and easily memorized,' see 'Christmas Carols New and Old,' by Bramley and Stainer, arranged for men's voices. Several of these may be sung by T.T.B.B. unaccompanied.

F. L.—Have you not made a mistake of a hundred years (too soon) in giving the date of J. [?] H. R. Mott? On February 1, 1817, Isaac H. R. Mott, a composer and teacher of music in Brighton, invented what he called the sostinente pianoforte. Later on (in 1846) he was in business at 76, Strand, as a pianoforte maker, and obtained a patent for improving the tone of musical instruments and making them much more durable and impervious to the trials of extreme climates, &c. Mott exhibited at the Great Exhibition of 1851, but we are unable to tell the date of his death, or give any further particulars concerning his career.

C. W.—The Cambridge quarter chimes are the same as those at Westminster. Their origin is thus given: Dr. Jowett (1752-1813), Regius Professor of Law at Cambridge, having been consulted by the University authorities on the subject of chimes for the clock of St. Mary's, Cambridge, took into his confidence a pupil of Dr. Randall, the Professor of Music. The pupil, who was no other than the afterwards famous Dr. Crotch, took the fifth bar of the symphony of Handel's air 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' and expanded it into the familiar chimes.

J. H. H.—(1) The book on hymn-tunes which you are seeking is entitled 'Scottish Church Music: its Composers and Sources,' by James Love, published by Messrs. William Blackwood and Sons. (2) There is a Life of the Rev. Dr. J. B. Dykes, edited by Canon Fowler, and published by Mr. John Murray. So far as we know there is no separate memoir of Dr. H. J. Gauntlett, but you might consult the article on him in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.'

M. D. B.—(1) Mrs. Webster's books on the Theory of Music may be found suitable for the child mind. (2) There are many children's songs, 'with a simple accompaniment,' in Novello's School Songs: write for a catalogue. (3) 'A Handbook of Examinations in Music,' by Ernest A. Dicks, includes several examination papers that have been set by various examining boards. The foregoing books are published by Messrs. Novello.

DOROTHY.—The following books can be recommended to a young pianist who takes an interest in the history of the instrument: 'A description and history of the Pianoforte and of the older keyboard stringed instruments' by A. J. Hipkins, and 'The Pianist's Dictionary' by Ernst Pauer. Both of these are in the Primer Series (Novello). For a general history of music see that by Naumann (Cassell and Co.).

DOM.—Considering the French nationality of the promising young vocalist in whom you are interested, it is doubtful if she could obtain a scholarship at one of our leading music schools; but perhaps a local subscription could be organized on her behalf whereby she might receive the advantages of, say, the Royal Manchester College of Music, that Institution being the nearest to the city wherein the young lady resides.

F. A. F.—Of the two suggestions you make for the grouping of a male-voice choir:

(a) 1st B.—2nd B.	(b) 2nd T.—2nd B.
1st T.—2nd T.	1st T.—1st B.

we prefer that at (a), if the parts are well balanced; but the actual decision should be governed by the known strength of the various parts. Both groupings are, however, good.

G. J. S.—We do not know of a collected edition (as in the Peters and similar publications) of Beethoven's pianoforte pieces (other than Sonatas), and Schubert's Impromptus with English fingering (so-called), but many of these compositions thus fingered can be obtained separately of any music-seller. Why not keep to the general system of fingering—1, 2, 3, 4, 5?

J. F. M.—The hymn-tunes you mention were composed by Sir John Stainer for 'The Church of England Hymnal,' edited by Dr. A. H. Mann, and published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, Paternoster Row, from whom copies can be obtained. See the volume of collected hymn-tunes by Sir John Stainer for information on these points.

H. W. C.—There is no pianoforte solo arrangement of the Scherzo in Mendelssohn's first Symphony (in C minor). The original four-hands transcription is, we fear, out of print. The Octet version of the movement is, however, procurable in the Peters edition, but arranged only for pianoforte duet, not as a solo.

CANTANTE.—(1) The two most useful languages would undoubtedly be German and French for your Preliminary Arts Examination. (2) The 'Teacher's Manual,' by John Curwen, is one of the best books ever written on the first principles of teaching. It is published by Messrs. Curwen at four shillings.

QUARTUS.—For 'a few easy or moderately difficult pieces or arrangements for three violins and viola, with or without pianoforte,' see Easy Quartet (Op. 64) by R. Bohne; Thema und Variationen (Op. 6) by Theobald Kretschmann; and Four Easy Quartets (Op. 39) by F. Manns.

STUDENT.—(1) The 3-4 time-signature in Albeniz's Creole Cuba Caprice (for pianoforte) is wrong: it should be 6-8, as the rhythm of the piece is duple, not triple. (2) Charles Lüders, a professor of the pianoforte, died in London on June 7, 1883.

D. B.—(1) If two of the three questions you send us form part of an examination-paper, we consider them very unfair and in the nature of traps for candidates. Such tactics bring examinations into disrepute and cannot be too strongly condemned. (2) 'Ut' is pronounced oof.

R. W. P.—'How to start a men's choir,' by W. J. Kidner (J. Curwen and Sons), would certainly help you. See also 'The Child's Voice,' by Behnke and Lennox Browne (Sampson Low), for the information referred to in the second part of your question.

W. B. B.—The virginal pieces by Byrd you mention, and many others from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, are published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel. We do not know of any instrumental compositions of John Jenkins and William and Henry Lawes that have been published.

WAGNER (not Richard).—(1) The price of the vocal score of Rieni is 7s. 6d., and that of Die Walküre and Parsifal each 15s.; the prices are net. (2) 'The Star of Eve' is procurable in three different keys—E flat, G, and A. Copies can be obtained through any music-seller.

A READER.—The seventh note in the melody of 'Nel cor più' is a separate one, and is not tied to that which precedes it. The first line of the song is: 'Nel cor più non mi sento,' with one note to every syllable.

TELYNWR.—No, we do not think you could satisfactorily learn the harp without receiving some instruction in the technique of the instrument.

O. W. G.—We venture to suggest that you should write to the organist for the information you require, sending a stamped addressed envelope for reply.

M. R.—We regret that we cannot give the names of agents to whom 'to apply for musical work.'

WELSH RHAPSODY

FOR ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

EDWARD GERMAN.

Pianoforte Arrangement (in the Press).

Orchestral Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

It is a true Rhapsody, founded on four characteristic Welsh melodies, which are not only beautiful in themselves, but sound in this work as if confined in order to be thus contrasted. There are four sections in the Rhapsody, each based on its own melody. . . . The Rhapsody is, in point of fact, a kind of miniature symphony. It will certainly add considerable lustre to Mr. German's fame, for it is superior to any concert composition of his since the "Henry VIII." music, and the skill, more especially of his treatment of the last tune, where fragments are banded over the whole orchestra with splendid humour, is not only remarkable, but exactly characteristic of the composer.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The Rhapsody is a highly ingenious and attractive composition, richly scored, and having the advantage of those airs not only excellent, but more or less familiar to the public. . . . Mr. German handles these melodies with consummate skill, making each the basis of various readings and abounding flights of fancy which keep interest alive to the end. Moreover, the themes are arranged to bring the whole work into something like recognised musical form. . . . I cannot but place this Rhapsody among the very best things which Mr. German has done. It will be immensely favoured as well by a cultured audience as by a popular gathering. The work appeals, in short, to those who in music are gentle, and equally to those who are simple.

STANDARD.

The work is most richly scored, and attests in a marked degree to Mr. German's thorough musicianship. The success of the composition was instantaneous, and the cheers and applause were of the heartiest kind. It is, indeed, an exhilarating and stirring production which will probably speedily make its way into many concert rooms.

MORNING POST.

This work is founded on five Welsh melodies, the last being the famous "Men of Harlech." The manner in which the composer has manipulated his tunes is worthy of all admiration. With his mastery over instrumental resources he has devised many ingenious combinations, employed piquant rhythms, and finally brought his work to an imposing close with the grand Welsh melody played by the orchestra at its fullest.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Edward German is a fortunate young composer. . . . His latest composition, which he calls a Welsh Rhapsody, is certain to sustain his reputation as a musician. It is pleasing in conception, and brilliantly orchestrated. It was performed for the first time yesterday afternoon at the Cardiff Musical Festival, and at the close the composer, who conducted, was called three times to acknowledge the enthusiastic cheers and applause of the crowded assembly.

DAILY NEWS.

I can say at once that not only does the new work mark a new departure in the composer's style, but it immediately places him in the front rank of native composers who are helping in the renaissance of British music. . . . To my mind, the most promising and original section of the work is that which deals with "David of the White Rock." It shows a greater power of working-up than Mr. German has hitherto displayed. The opening section, too, is impressive and simple, and is a finely-contrasted introduction to the tranquil section which follows. But, indeed, the whole work is a welcome contribution to British musical art.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Mr. German has selected his materials well, and has made an admirable use of them. First we have a quick, bright movement based on the air "Loudly proclaim o'er land and sea," which forms a dignified exordium to the work. This leads without a break—for the Rhapsody resembles Liszt's well-known Hungarian Rhapsodies, in being continuous in form as well as in being based on folk-tunes—into a sort of scherzo formed out of two tunes, "Hunting the Hare," and "The Bells of Aberdovey," which are combined and contrasted with infinite resource and much charm, while the form of the first-named suggests the sort of tarantella rhythm in which Mr. German's soul delights. A slow movement is founded on the expressive tune "David of the White Rock," and as it fades away the finale begins with an almost imperceptible march rhythm which by degrees grows into the famous "March of the Men of Harlech." This is worked up gradually, culminating in a broad and dignified presentment of the theme. . . . In one sense I think the Rhapsody shows an advance, for while it is as beautiful as his music always is in its finely-wrought details, it is broader in general effect, and the well-chosen tunes have given a real emotional charm to the melodic material of the work.

THE LOVE THAT CASTETH OUT FEAR

SINFONIA SACRA

ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

VOCAL SCORE, PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.

String Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

The composer is always happy in his choice of subjects, and the words, when not taken from the Bible, are always vigorous, straightforward, and marked by a literary sense and such individuality as make it inevitable to guess that the composer is his own librettist. . . . "The Love that Casteth out Fear" is styled a "sinfonia sacra," and may perhaps be described as a meditation on Divine love, as contrasted with the vanity of human life, and illustrated in the lives of Moses, David, and St. Peter. . . . The music set to this poem is of Sir Hubert Parry's very best; the themes which stand in the prelude for Fear and Love are finely contrasted, and developed with the utmost skill; the parts for the mystic semi chorus are always solemn and simple in form, and both solo parts are grateful to the singers and pre-eminently expressive, while the composer's mastery of accentuation is as clear in this as in anything he has written. The full choruses are splendidly worked, and that which closes the first part, "He is full of compassion," &c., and the shorter numbers for full choir in the second part are masterly in conception and design. . . . The work, conducted by the composer, made a profound impression.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert's previous compositions have been for the most part works of action, but in his new creation, "The Love that Casteth out Fear," he is reflective and didactic. There is no dramatic character, and hardly a situation suggestive of drama here. Thus we have a great change—a change, as I think, for the better—resulting in a work which must be counted among the best from the composer's pen. . . . There is much of interest in the working out of the scheme, particularly in the employment of a semi-chorus, which, hidden from the view of the audience, takes, so to speak, the higher ground in the argument, now uttering the Divine words and always enforcing the lesson suggested in the title of the work. The full chorus stands on a lower plane, representing the human side of the great question with its hopes and fears. . . . Without disparaging the value of the solos and the orchestral part, it may justly be said that Sir Hubert Parry has lavished the best of his skill upon the music of the unseen chorus, much of which is of rare beauty and charm. But all the concerted sections are in the composer's best manner. They are eminently sane in thought and expression; they are well developed and free from any form of exaggeration or forced effect, while by no means conventional. As a matter of fact, these choruses may be taken as a model for the oratorio of the immediate future, when the didactic rather than the dramatic form is employed. . . . "The Love that Casteth out Fear" is a notable addition to the treasures of English music.

MORNING POST.

The special charm of the work does not lie, however, so much in any skill which is displayed as in the general outward simplicity of the music and its appropriateness to the words. . . . There is pathos and dignity in what may be termed the "Moses" solo, and very distinctive in style is the soft pastoral music in the accompaniment of the "David" solo; the composer in each case has found the right atmosphere. The second part is the more powerful. No one but an experienced composer could have treated the scene of Peter's denial in so unpretentious yet impressive a manner. The chorus, "There is none righteous," contains noble writing, while the pianissimo passage commencing at the words "There is no fear in love" is chaste and solemn.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The most brilliant section is undoubtedly the musical picture illustrating, in subdued tonal effects, the betrayal of the Saviour by Peter. This held the undivided attention of the congregation yesterday, and, judging from comments subsequently heard, was the most attractive, as it was the most dramatic, portion of the work.

STANDARD.

Sir Hubert Parry has contributed many fine choral works to the Festival scheme of the Three Choirs, but nothing so uplifting, illuminating, and noble as the sinfonia sacra, entitled "The Love that Casteth out Fear." . . . It need scarcely be added that the music is full of subtleties, and is elaborately scored. It is, indeed, a work of delicate and deep thought, dealing with the great unseen influence of life in a most masterly manner. Its chief characteristic, however, is its sustained loftiness and dignity, and by this it must be hailed as a masterpiece.

GUARDIAN.

Sir Hubert Parry has never risen more triumphantly to the height of his argument. The glory of the work lies rather in the perfect appropriateness of its style, in the austere and solemn reverence that pervades the whole, than in any individual passages of eminent beauty. . . . This is how the work opens; after a short instrumental prelude, the sorrowful Divine appeal, "O My people, what have I done to thee? Wherein have I wearied thee?" is softly breathed forth in solemn, sustained harmonies, and no one who heard it will forget the thrilling power of these simple chords, sounding, as it seemed, straight from heaven itself. . . . The most elaborate choral writing is reserved for the final number of the work, and it is marked by all the breadth and massive power and dignity which characterise Sir Hubert Parry at his best. . . . All music lovers will hope that this masterpiece will soon be brought to a second hearing.

OBSERVER.

The music by which the composer enhances this sublimely beautiful theme is of a sort that, in the estimation of all who realise the power of the art as an emotional language, must assuredly place him among the greatest masters. Here is music that purifies, elevates and strengthens all who have ears to hear. It comes from the heart, and so goes to the heart. It is sincere and wonderfully simple, and its tenderness at times is such that appreciation is constrained to seek relief in tears. Furthermore the oratorio is technically the greatest thing Sir Hubert has yet done, for the reason that in it the "art that conceals art" is exhibited to the full. There is no display of contrapuntal skill for its own sake—everything is made subservient to the great central purpose of the work; praise of the "one thing that availeth—Love." Sir Hubert Parry is not only a great musician—he is a great poet and a great teacher.

YORKSHIRE POST.

"The Love that Casteth out Fear" is essentially an earnest work, written by a man who is in profound earnest. . . . It is a lofty subject—the idea that while human effort must always be imperfect, love, as the one thing that availeth, can supply all deficiencies, and will prevail in the end. . . . The admirable poem which he has himself compiled and in part originated, is, indeed, a model libretto, and though one would be sorry to see the field of music narrowed, it seems to represent the highest type of subject for musical treatment. . . . Accordingly one is not surprised to find that it is laid out so as to form a congruous and well-proportioned whole. The mystic semi-chorus is alternated and contrasted with the full chorus in discussing the relations of man to God, and in attempting to find an answer to the questions, "What is man?" and "What is love?" . . . I have dwelt upon the nature of this libretto since it seems to me as near perfection as one can desire. It is treated with earnestness and power, and the work leaves behind it a remarkable sense of coherence and completeness.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

The effect of the unseen choir singing the words "O My people, what have I done to thee?" which has its continuation in the orchestra, is very poetical, and everywhere, indeed, the music has a deep religious impressiveness.

JOHN GILPIN
BALLAD FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA POEM BY COWPER
THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY
FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Price Two Shillings. Tonic Sol-fa, One Shilling.

THE TIMES.

In many respects Dr. Cowen has accomplished much in this "trifle." The ballad occupies but twenty short minutes in performance. His humour, it is true, is often of a very obvious kind; but it may be that in a work like this, evidently intended for small choral societies, for which it is admirably adapted, a certain amount of obviousness must be arrived at. . . . In short, the ballad is a very good example of what such ballads are expected to be, not too long, not too extortionate in the demands it makes on either chorus or orchestra—or, for that matter, on the hearer. It is, as we said, often rather obvious, generally rather boisterous, and is a rollicking, galloping (as the programme-book suggests) jeu d'esprit.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

His music is, in its way, as humorous as the words, and I cannot sufficiently praise the finesse with which he has surmounted certain very obvious difficulties due to the unchanged rhythm of the ballad, and the unavoidable need to suggest without monotony the beat of the horse's hoofs. . . . The orchestration is as brilliant and fanciful as anybody can desire. It "keeps the game alive" in most strenuous fashion, and to it is largely due the fact that there is not a dull bar in the work.

MORNING POST.

The success of his new work was never for a moment in doubt. . . . The work is wonderfully graphic; it abounds in amusing details and pursues its course brilliantly without flagging. It all goes with a snap. . . . There can be no doubt that "John Gilpin" is destined to become widely popular.

STANDARD.

The humour of the amusing ballad has been very happily caught, and its most diverting situations are illustrated with a directness and point that considerably increase their comicality.

JOHN E. WEST.

VOCAL SCORE, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.

String Parts (in the Press).STANDARD.

The composer has selected for his text verses 8, 9, 14, and 15 from Psalm cxxxii., and laid them out for chorus and orchestra with his usual keen perception of what is appropriate and effective. There are few devices to secure contrast and impressiveness of which Mr. West would appear to be ignorant, and he has made excellent use of his knowledge in the present instance. The orchestral portion, in particular, has manifestly been written with loving care, and the composer may be congratulated on the success of his effort.

DAILY NEWS.

It is a vigorous setting of music to verses taken from the 132nd Psalm. The rendering given to-day left nothing to be desired. The cantata contains no solo part, but derives its effects from its originality, skilful orchestration, and the variety of its movements. Of the three movements, the first and third will be the most acceptable, opening with a bold appeal to Divine activity, and closing with a melodious and peaceful "This shall be my rest for ever."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

An anthem, "specially composed for this Festival" by Mr. John E. West, "A Song of Zion," in a musical thought beautiful in its original conception and in its final form . . . completed the day's work.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Mr. John E. West has given his work some of the brilliance of an Oriental pageant, which must account for rather less of the reserve we are accustomed to in sacred music. The clash of cymbals and the boom of the big drum are much in evidence, and there is a glitter and luxuriance about the music quite in keeping with this idea. It is, however, by no means all noise, but effective and musical.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

One notes the influence of Sir Edward Elgar in the unusual animation of the instrumental figures. But, notwithstanding the slight twentieth century flavour suggested in various superficial ways, the composer shows himself essentially a conservative of the Anglican Cathedral service school.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

Mr. John E. West's anthem, "A Song of Zion," is an exceedingly able work. The scoring is brilliant, and with suggestions of Oriental colouring in the use of the percussion, the loud cymbals of the Royal Psalmist being conspicuous. . . . Mr. West's composition is much more than an occasional piece; it ought to be heard again, and assuredly will be, for it is far too good to be laid aside after to-day's performance.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

Mr. John E. West is one of the finest of our British composers, and his work written for the Gloucester Meeting of three years ago certainly gave him a wider reputation. But I am of opinion that his merit is by no means recognised to the measure of his desert. His contribution to the Festival to-day accentuates this opinion; "A Song of Zion," for chorus and orchestra, is certainly worthy of Festival honours. Throughout the entire work is displayed a consummate musicianship combined with dramatic feeling, and an agreeable lucidity standing in pleasant contrast with the laboured muddiness which some modern composers substitute for inspiration.

PRESS NOTICE.

"Eugen d'Albert, whose performances of classical pianoforte music may be called typical, has prepared a critically revised and instructive edition of Ludwig van Beethoven's Sonatas for the Pianoforte. It is of the greatest interest to follow one of the most eminent artists of our time in his progress through Beethoven's compositions. In contrast with many others with the same aim—his precursors in this field of work—Eugen d'Albert has been on the whole sparing with his notes and explanations on purely practical as well as musical details. But the player in a state of development will find abundance of help provided; while the accomplished artist is unimpeded, freely to unfold his individuality. The editor's utterances—given as foot-notes—always hit the mark with reference to the performance, and are, with all their brevity, of admirable exactness and precision of expression. They are original, and reveal the mind of a real artist. d'Albert, apart from his keenly-thought-out fingering, having given many dynamic and agogic hints, this excellent edition is highly to be recommended for teaching purposes. The 'New Testament of Piano-forte Music,' as Beethoven's Sonatas are called, in contradistinction to Bach's '48 Preludes and Fugues,' has but rarely found an interpretation commanding approbation for every detail like the present one by Eugen d'Albert."—Musikalisches Wochenblatt.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1904.

A FESTIVAL HYMN

FOR CHORUS AND ORGAN (AD LIB.)

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY

JEREMY TAYLOR

THE MUSIC BY

C. LEE WILLIAMS.

PRICE EIGHTPENCE.

THE TIMES.

The style is intentionally assimilated to that of the glorious period of the Elizabethan madrigalists, and it has been adopted with much success; indeed, the composer has not given the public anything of finer quality, of more sincere and solemn beauty, or greater technical skill.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Williams appears to have made special study of the composers, or some of them, who were Taylor's contemporaries. The result is entirely happy, and has given to English sacred music an unaccompanied motet worthy of comparison with anything by the old masters of our national sacred song. Mr. Williams has written in five parts, with a coda in eight parts. The work has considerable rhythmic freedom, and in this respect perhaps goes beyond the practice of the ancient masters; but the part-writing is throughout on the best model of the chosen period. The effect is therefore somewhat archaic, but everywhere the free movement of the parts and the massing of the harmonies keep the musical listener's attention on the alert. There are climaxes of much power, and as great variety in treatment as the compass of the poem admits. The composer even finds room for an impressive choral recitative (basses) on the words, "To-day almightiness grew weak; the word itself was mute and could not speak," this being followed in capital contrast by a passage for female voices in three parts. So does variety run through the work, in which is comprised an amount of thought and varied expression not often met with within the same space. The motet, conducted by the composer, was effectively performed, and made its mark on the record of the Festival.

STANDARD.

This is a motet intended to be sung unaccompanied, as it was this evening, under the composer's direction. It is a setting of Jeremy Taylor's Festival Hymn beginning "Awake, my soul, and come away." The work opens with a jubilant chorus in five parts, followed by an effective choral recitative for the basses. At its impressive conclusion pianissimo the female voices enter in three parts, with excellent contrast. Subsequently the sopranos are silent, when the tenors and basses come in; and so the way is prepared for the full choir, with which a cleverly-contrived approach is made to the final climax, where the parts are extended to eight. From the above description it will be surmised that Mr. Williams has written a highly effective motet, and afforded his singers many opportunities for legitimate display of vocal skill.

MORNING POST.

The motet—which is unaccompanied—contains some solid and effective music, and under the direction of the composer, Mr. C. Lee Williams, the choir distinguished itself, and save for the fact that the performance was in a cathedral, there would have been an immediate demand for its repetition.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The music of the hymn is dignified, as befits such words as these: but it is wonderfully like, in spirit, the ideal Festival work which goes forward on its way without ever apparently changing. There is, however, a charm about unaccompanied music, when it is sung with delicacy and with intelligence, that is so peculiarly its own, that it has of course flourished, far more greenly than it does now, both in England and in many an innocent small town in Germany.

OBSERVER.

Mr. Williams's score is for voices unaccompanied—mostly in five parts, but with a Coda in eight; and the effects produced are altogether admirable in their strength and purity. The choir sang the work con amore, displaying a flexibility and a command of nuance that reached a far higher standard than anything attained in the forenoon.

GUARDIAN.

The composer with rare skill has caught much of the old-world freshness and directness of the poem; the part-writing is refreshingly pure and lucid throughout, and the hymn is worked up to a massive climax with admirable mastery of effect.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Mr. Williams has always shown himself to be a musicianly composer, gifted with a vein of fresh and pleasant vocal melody. One has sometimes felt that his chief danger was lest his melodic gift should result in the achievement of the agreeable at the expense of earnestness and depth of expression, but in this case the assumption of an older style, which sits very naturally upon him, has obviated any suspicion of a lapse into prettiness, and to me at least this motet seems the most masculine thing he has done, besides being thoroughly vocal and effective.

THE HOLY INNOCENTS

AN ORATORIO

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY JOSEPH BENNETT

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. HERBERT BREWER.

VOCAL SCORE, PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

Vocal parts, price 1s. each. Full Score and Wind Parts, MS. String Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

Mr. Brewer's work is a decided advance on anything he has done as yet, and is certain to be appreciated wherever it is heard; for while the style is entirely modern as regards the design of the whole, the dramatic treatment, and particularly the admirable scoring, there is no straining after "effect," and no swerving from the principle that musical beauty is a thing in itself desirable. Beautiful the work undoubtedly is, and the themes are thoroughly characteristic and appropriate. . . . The journey of the Magi, the music in which the star is described, the cradle-song of the Virgin, are all passages of very decided beauty and charm; and if the orchestral description of the massacre may be held as a little conventional, as indeed it could hardly fail to be, the epilogue, in which a soprano solo is joined to the chorus, is dignified and expressive in no ordinary degree. Mention must also be made of a very fine seven-part chorus, "Lord God of Abraham," which precedes the scene of the massacre.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Bennett has dealt with the subject in six scenes, and the characters he has introduced include the Virgin Mary, Herod, and his wife Malthace, a name not found in the Scriptures, but known to historians. The Oratorio concludes with an Epilogue, the words of which are taken from a hymn by Bishop Heber. Mr. Brewer's setting of this dramatic theme is scholarly and melodious, and it contains all those elements which are likely to ensure its popularity among choral societies.

OBSERVER.

The composer has produced a work of singular sweetness and charm. . . . "The Holy Innocents" shows that Mr. Brewer is no mere "cathedral organist"; he is a musician well equipped as regards modern dramatic expression, and will in time no doubt write music that is destined to live.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The music is, speaking generally, far broader, richer, and more masculine than is the case with Mr. Brewer's earlier works. He handles the orchestra with ease and effectiveness, and his melodic gift, while it is constantly in evidence, does not lead him into paths of prettiness. He adopts for the most part the system of representative themes, of which many are instanced in the analysis, and he uses them happily and without any feeling that they are forced into their place. All the more obvious suggestions of the story are taken up and cleverly utilised, as, for example, the character of Herod, which is well developed in his dramatic solos. In the scene between Herod and the Magi there is an episode that is especially noteworthy, for not only is it agreeable as music, but conjures up an atmosphere. This is where the Magi tell how, as they drew near Jerusalem, the star shone with enhanced brightness, at which the music has a spaciousness of effect quite in keeping with the picture suggested by the words. In the solo in which the Blessed Virgin tells of her dream, Mr. Brewer's lyrical fancy has been happily employed, and here there is a carol-like feeling in the music that is as appropriate as it is charming. . . . The scene of the massacre presented obvious dangers in the direction of a crude realism that the composer has carefully avoided, yet he has not made the opposite mistake of tameness or formalism, but has in a brief and strenuous passage gone about as far as ideal art should go in this direction.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

The Oratorio is an enormous advance on anything previously produced by the composer, whose work has been heard at three or four previous Three Choirs Festivals; it is so modern in character as almost to exclude the idea that it was written by a specialist church musician. . . . I have no hesitation in classing Mr. Brewer's latest work with the music which will be heard, and more and more heard, in the future.

LIVERPOOL POST.

The story, with its contrasted moods of ambition, tenderness, savagery, and sorrow, affords Mr. Brewer excellent opportunities for a display of his undoubted gifts as a composer, and he has not failed to embrace them. . . . It is well written and skilfully orchestrated, the Massacre scene being finely depicted. The chorus contains some interesting work, that for the women being very effective, and one of the best numbers in the cantata. . . . The performance to-night was a distinct success, soloist and chorus giving of their best to make it such.

SCOTSMAN.

It is a work which comes under the category of melodious. Its simple tunefulness, its effective choral writing of the six and seven-part anthem order, its lyrical and occasionally dramatic qualities, are very effective. It was finely sung by the chorus, who were evidently considered by the composer in the planning out.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In dealing with the story thus prepared for him, Mr. Brewer has naturally followed the prevailing fashion, making liberal use of themes representative of persons and things, and with these weaving an orchestral network which is accompaniment and somewhat more. This may be considered a bold venture on the part of a musician who had done nothing of the kind before, and bold the venture certainly was, albeit there are plenty of models for aspirants to work from. The operation, however, even with the best models, is not so easy as it may appear to those who have never tried it, and Mr. Brewer must be warmly congratulated both upon the melodic significance of his themes and the skill with which he has woven them into the texture of his music. . . . Often during the course of the work we meet with the true spirit of the musical creator, which appears, for example, in the five-part unaccompanied chorus, "Lord God of Abraham," an impassioned and exalted outburst of supplication, in the lyrical scene following the arrival of the Magi at Bethlehem, and in the dramatic scene between Herod and Malthace which determines the fate of the Innocents. But in no sense does failure attach to the composer's first effort of this kind, and he may therefore be encouraged to make further essays outside the narrow limits considered as proper to a cathedral organist. There is good stuff in Mr. Brewer.

THE ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

The music is that of oratorios of the old type, and in this reversion to the Mendelssohn period Mr. Brewer deserves instant recognition, for the reason that he has at least striven to be original, a task not by any means an easy one. His themes are clear cut and of the kind that may be called melodious, and it will be readily conceded that in these days of modernity a return to the solid tuneful style too often means a repetition of what has been said before. There is such a thing in the realm of the drama as an actor's play, a term by this time generally understood of the people, and Mr. Brewer's work may be fittingly described as a singer's work. It is remarkably well laid out for the chorus. There are numbers of the part-song description, beautifully sonorous and eminently lyrical, and the whole thing is knit together with some good orchestration. Within the limits Mr. Brewer has obviously set himself, he has succeeded in writing a very pleasing work, and one which, while being well within the reach of the ordinary music-lover, never descends to the merely trivial. In an unaccompanied solemn prayer the chorus sang with splendid balance and tone, and altogether the composer, who conducted, secured a bright and even performance of an attractive work.

MANCHESTER COURIER.

The music is throughout broad and dignified, and at several places rises to very high excellence. There are some fine solos, especially those for the Mother of the Child Jesus, and the tenor who represents the Chief of the Magi, and the choruses are all without exception good—one, a solemn prayer, being exceptionally so. It is the greatest and also the best work which has been written by Mr. Brewer, and it will be a surprise if it is not heard frequently.

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.

Mr. Brewer has worked the purely melodic vein throughout, and in this respect the oratorio will doubtless commend itself to the numerous section of the musical public who like to be pleased as well as edified. Taken as a whole, the work will strengthen Mr. Brewer's position as a composer, for it has many fine movements. . . . Much of the concerted music is delightful, and there is a chorus for female voices divided into four parts, which is in particular full of plaintive grace. Mr. Brewer also writes well and substantially for his chorus. In the hymn, "Lord God of Abraham," the harmony of which falls very gratefully upon the ear, the composer pursues the most modern methods in regard to his orchestration, which is for the most part cleverly conceived and ingeniously worked out. A welcome characteristic in these days of blaring brass and banging drum is that Mr. Brewer resists the temptation to become too noisy, even when a highly dramatic situation affords an opening.

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Brewer has composed in this work music which, if striking out no new paths, is always scholarly, often melodious, full of dramatic and descriptive significance, and faithfully reflects the various phases and characterisation of the poem. It is just the sort of work within the reach of a fair-sized choral society, and making but moderate demands on the executants. For such there is a vast demand. The best thing in the oratorio is an unaccompanied prayer in seven-part harmony. It is written in the church style, and is strikingly effective. Another pleasing number is a pastoral chorus in nine-eight rhythm, sung to the Star by the people at Bethlehem.

SCENES FROM THE BALLET ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA

COMPOSED BY
W. H. REED.
Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.
String Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

This is an admirable work in its way, with plenty of swing and tuneful movement, remarkable distinction of themes, and a delightful mingling of two different rhythms in alternation. It is capitolyscored in a style befitting the suggestion of the title, and, if the ballet were in a more artistic condition in London, Mr. Reed's name would not be unknown for long. It made a great success under the composer's direction.

STANDARD.

The nature of the fantasia is explained by its title. Its composer, who directed its performance, is well known to the frequenters of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, at which several of his compositions have been played. The themes of the fantasia are conventional; but clever use is made of various dance rhythms, and if the scoring is suggestive of an Empire ballet, it is appropriate to the subject.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. W. H. Reed's orchestral fantasia "Scenes from the Ballet" is an ingenious and whimsical treatment of ballet rhythms, and displays an intimate knowledge of the resources of a modern orchestra.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

Mr. Reed's fantasia, as its title suggests, is based upon dance rhythm. It recalls, without being in any way like, Sullivan's "Overtura di Ballo." The work is scored for a large orchestra, with full percussion and bells; it is replete with taking themes, and is admirably worked out.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

Mr. W. H. Reed's remarkably clever and attractive work is full of piquant melody and dainty orchestration. After this Mr. Reed should be heard of at the Festivals.

"A feature of the service at St. Andrew's Church last evening, and which attracted a large congregation, was the rendering by the choir of F. Rollason's 'Stabat Mater Dolorosa.' In the solemnity of such surroundings and to an audience already impressed by the sacredness of the day, the beautiful music of this work, so touchingly descriptive of events connected with the Crucifixion, appealed with much force."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE
A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Is well ahead of all Mr. Gaul's previous efforts. . . . Special mention may be made of the treatment of the parable of the Prodigal Son, which occupies a conspicuous place."—Daily Star.

"The Victoria Hall, Hanley, was well filled by an audience who gave enthusiastic evidence of their approval of Mr. Gaul's music. The chorus and band numbered 350 performers. . . . A striking feature in the form of a delightfully instrumented Eastern dance in itself is sufficient to enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation."—STAFFORDSHIRE CORRESPONDENT, The Musical Times.

"Judged by the appreciative reception accorded it by the crowded audience at Griffithstown, it bids fair to eclipse the popularity of the same composer's 'Holy City'. . . . 'The Prince of Peace' is a work of an exceptionally high order. There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. The work is varied and interesting, and, like all of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, supplies a need which no other composer of music so satisfactorily meets, viz., a moderately difficult work written on classical lines. . . . The cantata occupied about ninety minutes, and from the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment. . . . Already we understand numerous requests have been made for an early repetition."—Pontypool Free Press.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . 'Thou art the King of Glory,' a singularly fine chorus, worthy of any composer, living or dead. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm. This cantata, which completes the octave of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, we hold to be the best. If it prove less popular than the composer's 'The Holy City,' we shall be surprised. Mr. Gaul was engaged on this, his latest work, for about three years, and we believe that all who hear it will agree that the time was very profitably spent."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"In every way worthy the great reputation and experience of its composer. . . . Is indeed a work of a very unusual character, and most probably destined to become more popular than any of his other compositions. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"A work from the pen of the composer of 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc' will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Will assuredly soon be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers, . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner. . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—'The Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'—Newcastle Daily Journal.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—"This Society came forward with the first performance in London of Mr. Gaul's Cantata 'The Ten Virgins.' The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. If the verdict of a miscellaneous audience, that could have no possible reason for being favourably prejudiced, is of any account in estimating the merit of a new work, a career that will rival that of the same composer's 'Holy City' may be predicted for 'The Ten Virgins.' That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

HYMN TUNES AND LITANIES

AND

(276)

COMPOSED BY

REV. J. B. DYKES, MUS. DOC.

COLLECTED FROM VARIOUS SOURCES

INCLUDING

MANY HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED.

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The Rev. J. B. Dykes was well known to most people as a writer of beautiful hymn-tunes, but it will come as a surprise to some to find that he had written such a large number as this volume contains.

On looking through the book one is struck by the many tunes that are known and loved by all religious-minded persons—tunes so successfully wedded to the words, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to get on without them. They are “on the lips of thousands,” and are associated with the most solemn moments of life. But because Dr. Dykes was happy in expressing emotions in a way that was intelligible to the masses, we must not overlook the real difficulty and merit of discovering a musical way to the hearts of men—for not every great composer has been successful with hymn-tunes.

The world is richer for Dr. Dykes's music, and his memory deserves to be loved and honoured by all those who, like himself, strive to follow in the footsteps of the Divine Master.

"The impersonation of Rinaldo has been sustained by Mr. William Wild, whom the Choral Society of Constantinople had especially engaged from England for this production. He possesses a fine tenor voice of sufficient strength, and above all, uses it very artistically."—Stamboul Journal, March 19, 1904.

"Mr. William Wild, who has been specially engaged by the Constantinople Choral Society, is the possessor of a fine tenor voice of a very sweet quality, and entirely under command. His rendering of the important tenor solos was brilliant, while his artistic merits are enhanced by his modest demeanour."—Levant Herald and Eastern Express, March 21, 1904.

"The tenor, Mr. William Wild, who had come specially from London to sing 'The Crusaders,' proved a great acquisition to the Society. His voice is a pure and very sweet tenor, over which he has complete control. In his solo work and in connection with the chorus, he showed himself a true artist, and it is to be regretted that engagements in England prevented him from giving the public more opportunities of hearing him in this city."—Le Moniteur Oriental, March 26, 1904.

DIE MEISTERSINGER.—LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

"Mr. Parker has exactly the qualities of a good Beckmesser, and his singing was full of fun which never degenerated into buffoonery."—The Times, October 10, 1904.

"Mr. Herbert Parker deserves very hearty praise for his able reading of this bit of low comedy, which is often purposely given to a comedian rather than a vocalist. Mr. Parker's singing was distinctly too musical and too powerful from a dramatic point of view, but on the concert platform this was perhaps desirable, and in any case he acquitted himself well of an unaccustomed task."—Yorkshire Post, October 8, 1904.

"... While Mr. Parker perhaps overtopped the whole of them by his correct reading of the humorous part of Beckmesser, a vocalist who can sing his 'Beckmesser' as Mr. Parker did should be heard of again."—Sheffield Independent, October 8, 1904.

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

When the history of music during the nineteenth century comes to be written, the name of a revered master will stand out pre-eminently, as one devoted to the art and possessing great kindness of heart. Franz Liszt—for that is his name—lived through three-fourths of the century, veritably an epoch-making period in the evolution of the art of music; and during the whole of his eventful and industrious life he spared not himself in encouraging, influencing, and helping on many earnest-minded musicians who came under the spell of his magnetic charm and stimulating personality. Among those who owe not a little to this generous-hearted man is the subject of this Biographical Sketch.

Eugen D'Albert—to give his full baptismal name, Eugène François Charles D'Albert—was born on April 10, 1864, at 4, Crescent Place, Glasgow, where his parents were temporarily residing, his father following the profession of dancing-master with success. The house—or, to be strictly accurate, 'tenement'—in which the boy drew his first breath has since been pulled down: its site is now occupied by the Grand Hotel, situated at the west end of Sauchiehall Street, at its junction with St. George's Road. Notwithstanding his French name of Charles Louis Napoleon D'Albert, the father of Eugen was of German nationality, he having been born at Nienstetten, near Altona, on February 25, 1809. Although he made a great reputation as a composer of dance music, it should not be forgotten that he had been a pupil of Samuel Wesley and of Kalkbrenner. He settled at Newcastle-on-Tyne and married a Miss Annie Rowell there. Eugen, the eldest child of this union, made his entry into the world when his father had entered his fifty-sixth year. This, and other circumstances, accounted for a certain loneliness in the boy's home-life and the years of his childhood. He was misunderstood, and 'cribbed, cabined, and confined' to such an extent as to largely prejudice him against the country which gave him birth.

He was practically self-taught in music until he had reached the age of twelve. At that time (1876) the National Training School for Music was inaugurated, and the boy was elected Queen Victoria Scholar at that Institution, which shows how remarkable were his musical gifts. His teachers were Mr. Ernst Pauer, Professor Prout, Sir John Stainer, and Sir Arthur Sullivan. The last-named must have thought very highly of the youth's abilities, because he entrusted him with the arrangement for pianoforte of the score of 'The Martyr of Antioch,' and D'Albert was then only sixteen.

One of his fellow students, Mr. Walter G. Alcock, organist of the Chapels Royal, has kindly furnished the following reminiscences of the South Kensington days in the following words:

My first meeting with D'Albert was on May 17, 1876, at the opening of the National Training School for Music. I well remember that he quite electrified us all when he, a mere child, played quite splendidly. When Sir Arthur (then Mr.) Sullivan started a composition and counterpoint class—which, I believe, was first constituted of D'Albert, Frederic Cliffe and myself—we were amazed at the amount of work D'Albert brought, and I recollect Sullivan's saying on one occasion: 'Good gracious, my dear boy, do you expect me ever to get through this?' When Professor Prout took Sir Arthur's class, D'Albert again astonished us one day by bringing as his composition exercise his much-played Pianoforte Suite in D (Op. 1), containing a delightful Gavotte and Musette. He turned up on another occasion with a Scena, and Dr. Prout sent me flying downstairs to fetch Dr. Stainer, and we had it all over again. Dr. Prout told us afterwards that he considered D'Albert equal to Mendelssohn at his age, and we all felt much impressed. I shall never forget a remarkably fine performance by him, at a pupils' concert in the West Theatre of the Albert Hall, of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor. I enjoyed many a pleasant walk with him from his father's house in St. Mary Abbott's Terrace to the Training School, and I retain the pleasantest recollections of his good nature in those days of his early teens.

There lies before us the word-book of the First Public Concert—given at St. James's Hall, June 23, 1879—of the students of the National Training School for Music. From this we learn that Eugen D'Albert played the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, and that a Concert Overture (in C major) composed by him was performed. Mr. Alcock remembers the genial theme of the second subject of the Overture, and that the youthful composer had the honour of being received by the Prince of Wales (now King Edward VII.), who was present at the concert, after he (D'Albert) had played, in a masterly manner, Schumann's ever-beautiful Concerto. In the following year—on May 25, 1880—Sullivan took a 'Deputation,' as it was called, of students to the Mansion House, where, in the presence of the late Duke of Edinburgh and the Lord Mayor, the young people displayed their several abilities. THE MUSICAL TIMES of June, 1880, in recording that music-making, said :

The pianoforte solos by Mr. Eugène D'Albert—Andante from First Sonata (Schumann), Etude in A minor, Op. 25 (Chopin)—were, without doubt, the most successful instrumental performances. This young gentleman needs no apology on the score of brevity of years, for he plays with all the certainty, expression, and fire of a practised artist.

These public appearances had not a little to do with D'Albert's first appearance—at the early age of sixteen!—at the Monday Popular Concert of November 22, 1880. THE MUSICAL TIMES may again be quoted in this connection :

A young pianist, Mr. Eugène D'Albert, a pupil of the National Training School at South Kensington, made his first appearance at the Popular Concerts on the third Monday of last month (22nd ult.), creating a very favourable impression as to his talents as a musician and the soundness of his artistic training. The work chosen by the young artist for his solo performance was well calculated to serve as a test for both the qualities named, having been Schumann's 'Etudes symphoniques,' in the rendering of which Mr. D'Albert displayed much taste and technical skill, being much and deservedly applauded in consequence. Equally successful was the young artist's interpretation of the pianoforte part of Beethoven's Sonata in A major, for pianoforte and violoncello, played in conjunction with Signor Piatti, and there can be no doubt that Mr. D'Albert is entering upon a career of great promise.

In the following spring (1881) the gifted young pianist—then still in his seventeenth year—had the honour of appearing at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts and at the Philharmonic Concerts ; on both occasions (February 5 and March 10) he played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto—'a most remarkable performance' is the record (of the first concert) in these columns. 'Not only was the mechanical finish perfect, but there was an amount of musical feeling and an intelligent appreciation of the composer's meaning very rare in one so young. The performance excited the greatest enthusiasm, and very naturally.'

In the year 1881 the Richter Concerts were in the hey-day of their existence. The great conductor showed his appreciation of D'Albert's genius by inviting him to play his first Pianoforte Concerto at the concert of October 24, 1881, on which occasion the young composer-pianist and his work were received with real enthusiasm, 'three times recalled at the close, amid genuine excitement' being recorded in connection therewith. A month later—on November 25, 1881—D'Albert was elected Mendelssohn Scholar, but this he held for one year only. It cannot be said that he lacked appreciation in this country, because in truth his genius was early recognised by our leading concert-giving institutions, by the press, and by the musical public, and all these joined in paying tribute to one highly endowed with a rare artistic temperament. In this connection it is exceedingly pleasant to hear from the lips of Herr D'Albert the following words, of which he authorizes the publication : 'The former prejudice which I had against England, which several incidents aroused, has completely vanished since many years.'

The young pianist composer was then taken by Dr. Richter to Vienna, where he continued his studies and played his own Pianoforte Concerto at the Vienna Philharmonic Society early in the spring of the following year (1882). He was the youngest pianist that had appeared at that important concert-giving institution, where his performances created quite a sensation. In May, 1882, he visited England, playing at the Richter and Crystal Palace concerts with ever-increasing success. Except for an Overture to Hölderlin's 'Hyperion,' played at the Richter concert of June 8, 1885, the name of Eugen D'Albert seems to have disappeared from English concert-programmes till 1896, a period of fourteen years.

In deciding to make Germany his home, D'Albert was greatly influenced by Liszt, whose pupil he became. The great pianist took a special fancy to him, whom he called 'Albertus Magnus.' 'He used to say,' recalls Herr D'Albert, 'that it would have pleased him to be my rival at the piano when he was young—now he would not risk it, being too old.' That Liszt's confidence in and affection for him was fully justified, and that it was rich in result, has been proved by the fact that D'Albert has long been known as one of the most distinguished pupils of the king of pianists. So rapid, indeed, did D'Albert advance in technical skill and ripened musicianship, that in 1882, when only eighteen years of age, he was appointed Hofpianist des Grossherzogs von Weimar. He gave his first concert at Berlin on January 10, 1883, when he played his Pianoforte Suite, composed during his pupilage in England—a work that is a delightful blending of the ancient and modern styles. On that occasion his 'stupendous mechanism, beautiful and expressive touch, and original taste' evoked the warmest enthusiasm, manifestations rare indeed on the part of a critical Berlin audience. During the next few years Herr D'Albert lived the life of a distinguished pianoforte virtuoso, travelling and giving concerts in Germany, Russia, Italy, France, Spain, England, America (twice), everywhere gaining fresh laurels as an interpreter of the highest rank. At the Gewandhaus (Leipzig), on November 3, 1893, he emulated one of the famous feats of Hans von Bülow by playing at one sitting the following five Pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven—Op. 31, 53, 90, 109, and 110, performing these masterpieces with all the fulness of masterly technique and intellectual insight, and moreover in a manner sufficient to justify the statement that as an exponent of Beethoven, Eugen D'Albert has few, if any, equals.

In 1896, after an absence of fourteen years, he made his reappearance in England at a Mottl concert—April 28, Queen's Hall—when he played Beethoven's E flat Pianoforte Concerto, his performance of that colossal creation being 'marked, in a high degree, by the breadth, intelligence, technical skill, and power that already characterised his playing in 1882.' He played at two concerts of the Philharmonic Society during that season (1896) that is to say, he does not allow his individuality to unduly colour or distort the composer's intention, but with all earnestness of purpose he endeavours to interpret the music of his choice with deep reverence and true artistic sincerity.

While it may be hoped that Herr D'Albert has no intention of giving up his pianoforte playing just yet, there are ominous signs that he is devoting himself more and more to composition. Although he is only forty years of age he has already composed eight operas! Like other composers he does not always find a smooth path in the direction of getting his works performed. For instance, in

HERR D'ALBERT'S SUMMER RESIDENCE AT MEINA, LAGO MAGGIORE.

—a rare distinction—his concertos being Liszt's in E flat and Beethoven's in G. A quartet of pianoforte recitals—May 1, 12, 19, and June 2—not only greatly increased his reputation, but completely re-established him in the favour of the English musical public. THE MUSICAL TIMES in a notice of one of these recitals said: 'His rendering of the Waldstein Sonata was the finest heard in a London concert-room since the days of Rubinstein and Bülow.' Could higher praise be given? Versatility is a marked feature of Herr D'Albert's executive gifts. He may be regarded as a subjective player—order to secure the production of his first opera, 'Der Rubin' (at Karlsruhe, in 1892), the impresario made it a condition that the composer should pay into the managerial exchequer the costs of production, that is to say 5,000 marks (£250). But not in opera alone has he found an outlet for his creative muse. The subjoined list of his compositions includes a symphony, an overture, two pianoforte concertos, a violoncello concerto, two string quartets, in addition to the pianoforte suite already mentioned, pianoforte pieces, songs, &c. As a composer he claims to be 'an apostle of artistic truth.' No one can find fault with so commendable a creed, and we trust that he will long be spared to live up to a confession of faith so true to the principles of the art to which he devotes his life.

In the summer months of the year Herr D'Albert exchanges his Berlin residence for his charming villa on Lago Maggiore, of which we give a photograph. Here, in this seclusive and romantic spot, he passes a delightful existence, the pleasant hours being apportioned between composition and such recreations as cycling and lawn-tennis. It should be added that he takes a great interest in all sports and in medical science, though in regard to the last-named hobby he by no means aspires to become a doctor of music.

NORWICH CATHEDRAL.

The interests of a city are not always centred in its predominant feature. Norwich is a case in point. It is the birthplace of several distinguished persons; in this it at least justifies its geographical position, for did not the wise men come from the East? Before making mention of some of the chief buildings in the city, its fame-roll of natives may be examined with satisfactory results. Among Norwicensians of note were Archbishop Parker, who preserved some of the most precious MSS. now in Corpus Christi College Library, Cambridge, among them being the earliest example of score writing (see Burney's History), and whose Psalter contained the first appearance of Tallis's tune now associated with Bishop Ken's Evening hymn; Dr. Cajus, a name worthily linked with Gonville at Cambridge; Bishop Bateman, who founded Trinity Hall College, Cambridge; Joseph John Gurney, the Quaker philanthropist, and his self-denying sister, Elizabeth Fry; Harriet and James Martineau, Mrs. Opie, and the Rev. Minor Canon Walker, a worthy quartet of literary workers; John Crome, founder and chief of the Norwich School of Painters; and was not Sir Thomas Browne, author of the 'Religio Medici,' an inhabitant for nearly half a century?

In the art of music we find the following among the natives of Norwich: Dr. Edward Miller, composer of the tune 'Rockingham'; Edward Taylor, who was Sheriff of the City and one of the principal organisers of the Festival as a triennial event, and a former Gresham Professor of Music; George Perry, the first conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society (London), and the composer of an oratorio on the subject of 'Elijah'; Drs. Crotch, Bunnett, and Mann; Mr. A. R. Gaul; Frederick Gunton, organist of Southwell and Chester, and two 18th century Cathedral organists, Samuel Porter, of Canterbury, and Henry Hayden, of St. Asaph—all the foregoing in addition to other musicians connected with Norwich Cathedral, to whom reference will subsequently be made. But we must not forget to add the name of Richard Mackenzie Bacon (1776-1844), who projected and edited the Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review, the first English journal of importance entirely devoted to music—a periodical which came into existence in January, 1811: its ten volumes being completed in 1829.

In the Middle Ages Norwich ranked as the second city in the Kingdom. Its name is probably of Norse origin—from wic = a creek, hence the village on the north of the creek would be called Northwic, from which is easily evolved Norwich. The city stood on a tidal bay in 1004. In that year the Danes devastated and ruined the place in revenge for the massacre of their countrymen by Æthelred-the-Unready. As the known history of the city may be said to begin with that Danish spoliation (1004), Norwich celebrates its nine hundredth birthday this very year!

Its most ancient building is the Castle, formerly a place of durance vile, but now converted into a Museum, famous for its fine collection of raptorial birds, and an art gallery of which the citizens may justly feel proud. The Grammar School—the upper part of which was originally the chapel of St. John the Evangelist, its lower part a charnel-house!—at which several distinguished men have been educated during the six hundred years of its existence: one of its most illustrious alumni being Horatio, Viscount Nelson, England's greatest naval commander. St. Andrew's Hall is a 15th century building, now devoted to civic purposes, but originally the nave of a grand church of the Dominicans, or Black Friars. Therein are held the Norwich Musical Festivals, which began in 1788 and were established as triennial events in 1824.

Of the forty-four (or more) churches in Norwich, that of St. Peter Mancroft justly claims first attention after the Cathedral. This noble sanctuary is also a product of the 15th century, the beautiful canopy of its font being an antiquarian gem of the first water. Music has so long been associated with charity in one of its noblest forms—the relief of the suffering poor—that no account of Norwich and its music would be complete without reference to 'The Jenny Lind Infirmary for Sick Children.' This, one of the best benefactions of the city, owes its origin to two concerts given by Jenny Lind (Madame Goldschmidt) in St. Andrew's Hall in January, 1849, when the net proceeds amounted to the sum of £1,253, a gratifying result of the tender-hearted promptings of that great and generous artist.

Norwich Cathedral, unlike many of its stately compeers in these Islands, does not occupy the site of any earlier church. To-day it stands, more or less intact in its Norman purity, as it was left by Bishop Eborard in the year 1145. The foundation stone was laid by Herbert de Losinga, the first Bishop of Norwich, in 1096, on a piece of land called Cowholme, i.e., a pasture surrounded by water. The exterior of the fair fane is sometimes unfavourably compared with its interior, but without sufficient justification. The tower, with its spire, is a redeeming feature of remarkable significance. It is the second highest in England—315 feet against the 404 feet of Salisbury—and viewed from the Close in the brilliant sunlight of a perfect October morning, it fascinates the beholder by its perfect uprising. And who can gaze upon those fine flying-buttresses at the east end without being charmed by their strength and beauty?

The two gates at the western entrance to the Close add picturesqueness to the external attractions of the Cathedral. The earliest of these twin portals is St. Ethelbert's Gate, an early Decorated structure temp. Henry III., also well-known even early in the 19th century as 'The Gate House,' a room for practices for concerts to be held in, and moreover at one time used as a schoolroom for the choristers. The Erpingham Gate, opposite the west front of the Cathedral—built as an act of penance about 1420 by Sir Thomas Erpingham, and containing his kneeling figure—is architecturally original and unique, furnishing, as it does, a type of the best Perpendicular work. Shakespeare has this reference to the soldier-knight, who commanded the archers at the battle of Agincourt:

King Henry. Good morrow, old Sir Thomas Erpingham :
A good soft pillow for that good white head
Were better than a churlish turf of France.
(King Henry V., iv., 1.)

Upon entering the Cathedral at the west door its great height at once arrests attention. This unusual loftiness, intensified by the narrowness of both nave and choir, reminds one of Westminster Abbey. Then the large open arches of the triforium admit the light in such profusion that the building is flooded with glorious sunshine in radiant purity. The piers of the nave are not only unusually massive, but alternate in design. The nave vault (72 feet in height) of stone, replaced (in 1446-72) the original Norman wooden roof destroyed by fire, while the carved bosses—328 in number—are worthy of special study. As Mr. Quennell, in his book on the Cathedral, says:

To those who take an interest in early stone-cutting, this vault of Norwich is a store of inexhaustible treasure; the bosses, rudely cut as they are, tell their own tales with singular truth and directness. Their sculpture may not display the anatomical knowledge of the work of the Renaissance; yet it has a distinct decorative value that has been seldom equalled in the later decadent period.

The accompanying photographs illustrate the main architectural outlines of the Cathedral, but a few less prominent features may be noticed. The processional path at the east end is unique, and the Confessio or Relic Chapel is of special interest. There is a very rare relic of a Norman episcopal chair, cut in stone, behind the altar. The Jesus Chapel—re-restored from a floorless lumber room to a most beautiful sacred building, entirely by that noble man the late Dean Goulbourn—contains an altar of grey Barnack stone. This, and St. Luke's Chapel, both of them circular in design, add to the beauty and stateliness of the magnificent Norman apse. Upon looking up to the roof of the tower one cannot fail to be impressed with the rich Norman work of the lantern. The Pelican lectern in the choir is one of those quaint productions of mediæval times, while the sixty stalls—fine specimens of 15th century work—and their attendant misericordes are well worth detailed examination.

There is now no Chapter House nor Lady Chapel at Norwich. A glorious example of the latter did exist, but it was allowed to fall into ruin by a former Dean who, strange to say, has a monument erected to his memory in the Cathedral. Possibly the material for this monument was supplied from the ruined chapel. Some compensation, however, for the decay of these old buildings is found in the beautiful Cloisters, at one time partly filled with coloured glass,—begun in 1297 and finished in 1430—which are among the handsomest in England. They are situated on the south side of the Cathedral, the interior garth being about 145 feet square. The apartments formerly used by the monks are over the three sides of the cloisters, a very small portion of which is now appropriated to the choristers' day-school. The Prior's door, a fine specimen of early Decorated work, and the sculptured vault-bosses (as in the Cathedral) are features of this splendid appendage to the main edifice. The Locutory, where the monks indulged in their daily gossip, is a Norman apartment now used as a choir practice and schoolroom, and admirably serves its purpose.

The musical history of Norwich Cathedral is peculiarly rich in interest. There must have been an organ in the church during the first half of the 14th century, as an organist named Adam (of whom more anon), is recorded as having held office in 1333. Thirteen years later there was an organ in St. Mary's Chapel, and in 1386 there are records of the purchase of music books for clergy and choir. In the latter part of the 14th century there were at least two organs in the Cathedral, and in 1411 an organ-blower is mentioned. A new 'payre of organs in the choir,' a gift, cost £13 6s. 8d. In 1607 the Dean and Chapter agreed that a new organ should be made 'and timber fitted to make a loft for it'; this instrument was repaired in 1626, and the sum of £10, which Abel Colls gave to the church, was bestowed upon it. Sir Thomas Browne, in his 'Repertorium,' tells us that 'in the late tumultuous time' [the Civil War] this organ

Norwich Cathedral.

(Photograph by Mr. A. E. Coe, Norwich)

'was pulled down, broken, sold, and made away. But since his majesty's restoration, another fair, well-tuned, plain organ, was set up by Dean Crofts and the Chapter, and afterwards painted, and beautifully adorned.'

Some interesting particulars of the 'Dean Crofts' organ and subsequent instruments are recorded by Dr. Humphrey Prideaux, Canon, and afterwards Dean of Norwich,—the two offices covering a period of forty-three years—in a MS. volume preserved in the Cathedral Treasury, extracts from which have kindly been made specially for this article by Dr. W. T. Bensly, the Chapter Clerk. In the year 1661, among 'Monies disbursed uppon Reparations of ye Church' are the following payments:

To Rich. Plumm of Bury for ye Organ	-	45	0	0
To Mr. Pease for a new sett of Pipes	-	18	0	0
To a painter for gilding ye Pipes	-	02	0	0
For taking down ye Organ, packing it, Cariadg, &c.	-	5	0	0

Worthy Dean Prideaux records, in the year 1689:

A Perticuler of the additional Stopps and new worke put into the Great Organ in Christ Church [the Cathedral] over and above the agreement made with Dr. Kidder [6th Prebend, or Canon] for £200 in behalfe of the Reverend Dean and Chapter of Norwich.

For one open Diapason of fine Mettal in the west front consisting of 50 pipes	-	100	0	0
For the joyners in altering the case and carveing	-	030	0	0
For one furniture of rankes aded to the Choir Organ consisting of 150 Pipes, and two more added to the furniture and mixture in the Great Organ	-	030	0	0
For six stopps of Echoes consisting of 150 Pipes with Sound bord move- ment and Keys, &c.	-	100	0	0

The intire number of usefull pipes in the great Organ is 1375, there being 975 new pipes, and but 400 old.

The Indorsement of this document reads: 'An account of the additionall stopps put into ye Organ by Harris, ye organ maker, 1690.' This organ maker was, of course, the celebrated Renatus Harris, the rival of Father Smith, and the instrument he 'made' consisted of 3 manuals and 20 stops—Great 10, Choir 5, Echo 5—without either pedal keys or pipes! We now find the name of an organ builder of whom comparatively little is known—Christian Smith, a nephew of Father Smith. Dean Prideaux, under date 'Jan. 9 1698,' records the following:

Memorandū an Agreement was made with Christian Smyth of London Organ maker to repair our Organ and put it in good sound and perfect repair in all its parts and appurtenances for wch he was to receive 80£, i.e. 50£ at ye concluding of ye work and ye remaining 30£ at ye next Audit.

And he did alsoe further agree to keep ye sayd Organ in good sound and perfect repair for ye Salery of 5£ to be payd him annually on St. Andrews day and ye first payment to be on St. Andrews day A^o Dni 1700 and not befor.

And he did further agree that in case any decay were in ye sayd Organ that he was to come down to put in repair on notice and that if it were not don within 6 months after notice that then he is to loose ye salery of 5£ for that year and in case it be not repaired within other six months after ye sayd notice that then ye Dean and Chapter may employ any other organ maker to repair ye sayd decays and that he the sayd Christian Smyth shall pay all ye charges thereof.

Wch Articles being agreed to & sealed by ye sayd Christian Smyth and he having accordingly finished ye work wch he undertooke ye sayd 50£ was payd him by ye Treasurer of the Church. The Articles are entered in the Ledger booke of ye Church.

It is evident that the Norwich organist of that time quite sustained the reputation of the race in wanting more stops, though they seldom defray the cost thereof, as in this instance, for we learn that, on May 29, 1699:

Mr. Cooper Organist of ye Church did at his owne charge ad a Trumpet stop to ye Organ wch was now finished by Mr Christian Smyth who repaired the sayd Organ in the beginning of ye year flor which stop Mr. Cooper payd him.

On June 5, 1759, it was ordered by the Chapter 'to treat and agree with some proper person or persons to repair the organ.' Evidently the 'proper person' turned out to be John Byfield, son-in-law of John Harris, son of Renatus, as he repaired the organ at a cost of £225. It was opened on November 30, and a new anthem, composed by Mr. Garland, was sung.

In 1833 extensive alterations were carried out by Bishop at a cost of £510 10s., the reconstructed instrument being opened by Mr. Z. Buck (afterwards the famous Dr. Buck) on January 12, 1834. The changes made by Bishop included 'long octaves, GG to F,' 1½ octaves of 'German pedals, supplying a depth of bass intonation rarely equalled.' Composition pedals were added, also a clarabella stop (Bishop's invention), and the organ was enclosed in a general swell. The unsightly case was improved in appearance. According to a contemporary account the case formerly contained :

The gilt figure of a Roman lady standing forward before a recess in the centre, holding in her right hand a palm branch, and yet, absurdly enough, not bearing it upwards against the breast as the Christian Martyrs of old are usually represented, but projecting it forward as though it were some instrument, inasmuch that by many an ingenious conjecturer it had been converted into the bow of a violin !

For very many years after this nothing was done to the organ to enable it to retain the position it ought to have held as an instrument, and in course of time it could only be classed as one of the worst specimens of Cathedral organs in the Kingdom ; but it was only in that unenviable position owing to its incompleteness and the action being thoroughly worn out. The swell organ only went down to Tenor C : there were only two stops on the pedal organ. But some of the stops were as beautiful as could be met with anywhere. In course of time Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, induced the Dean and Chapter to remedy this discreditable state of affairs. The matter was taken in hand by the present Dean with his characteristic energy. Subscriptions were thereupon invited and received to the amount of £6,432 5s. 5d., and a new instrument of five manuals and adequate pedal organ was built by Messrs. Norman and Beard, the well-known firm of organ builders of Norwich, and opened on December 12, 1899. The great, swell, choir, and solo organs stand on the screen, together with five stops of the pedal ; the remaining pipes of the pedal stand upright in the south triforium. The great and swell soundboards are placed transversely across the screen : the choir organ speaks towards the east, and the solo organ towards the west end of the Cathedral. The echo organ—the gift of Mr. Hugh Barclay, in memory of his wife—stands in the triforium of the apse at the extreme east end of the Cathedral, and is a very charming adjunct to this fine new instrument.

Before we consider the roll of organists, something may be said concerning the singers in the Cathedral—lay-clerks and choristers. It speaks well for the musicianship of Norwich lay-clerks that one of their number was honoured in being quoted by old Thomas Morley. In that eminent musician's entertaining treatise, 'A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke' (1597), under the heading 'Definition of two parts in one' (p. 96), Morley, addressing an imaginary pupil, Philomathes, says :

It is when two parts are so made, as one fingeth euerie note and rest in the same length and order which the leading part did fing before. But becaufe I promised you to fet downe a vvaie of breaking the plainfong, before I come to speake of tvvoe partes in one, I will giue you an example out of the works of M. Perfley (vvhether with wee vvill content our felues at this present, becaufe it had bene a thinge verie tedious, to haue set dovne so manie examples of this matter, as are euerie vvhere to bee founde in the vvorkes of M. Refford, M. Tallis, Prefton, Hodgis, Thorne, Selbie, and others vvhere you shall find fuch varietie of breaking plainfongs, as one not verie well skilful scant deferne anie plainfong at all learn to break any plainfong whatfoe.

THE CHOIR AND ORGAN, LOOKING WEST.

(Photographed specially for this article by Mr. A. E. Coe, Norwich.)

After a little explanatory conversation between Master (i.e. Morley) and Philomathes, the former gives in score—in order that the pupil ‘should the more easilie perceiue the conueiance of the parts’—‘The plainfung (sic) of the Hymne Saluator mundi, broken in diuifion, and brought in a Canon of three parts in one, by Ofbert Parsley.’ Now, who was this Osbert Parsley (or Persley) whom Morley set up as a model? Born about the year 1511 he was for fifty years a ‘singing-man’ in Norwich Cathedral. Moreover, his contemporaries described him as ‘the most learned musician.’ His compositions are to be found in various libraries. He died in 1585, the same year as Tallis, and was buried in the nave of the Cathedral.

His monument is placed upon the fourth pillar from the west door on the north side of the nave. The epitaph, now obliterated, is thus given by Sir Thomas Browne in his ‘Repertorium’ (1712):

Here lies the Man whose Name in fpite of Death

The Norwich choristers have long been famous for their vocal achievements, and have not some of them made their mark as ‘grown-ups’? Here are some names: Thomas Vaughan, a very distinguished tenor vocalist in his day, Dr. Z. Buck, Dr. Philip Armes, Dr. Bunnett, Mr. George Gaffe (organist of St. Alban’s Abbey), Mr. A. R. Gaul, the late Mr. F. A. Mann and his younger brother, Dr. A. H. Mann, the Rev. A. W. Baldwin, the much-respected Chaplain at Wormwood Scrubbs, Mr. Montague Smith, late organist to the University of Glasgow. In this chorister connection it may prove interesting to quote from the ‘Brief Account of Cathedral and Collegiate Schools,’ compiled by Miss Maria Hackett, the choristers’ friend, in 1824. Under the heading Norwich she says:

The Cathedral Establishment at Norwich, as settled at the Reformation, was on a very narrow scale, and differed materially from the other foundations by King Henry VIII. There were no endowed Grammar Schools, nor was there any provision made for a Grammar Master and Usher, as in other Cathedrals of the new foundation, to instruct the boys of the Church, and such others as may resort to him, in literature and good morals. The Choristers were to be eight in number, to be chosen by the Dean. They were to reside with their Music Master, ‘and to be found in table and diet, especially four of them that are most fit to serve in the Choir, until the table in the Common Hall be provided for them.’ They were to receive an annual livery-gown, but no money payments. The statutes require, that they shall be taught to sing, and to play on instruments of music.

Considerable deviations have taken place from these injunctions (by what authority does not appear), which have made the situation of a Chorister much less valuable, than was designed by their Royal Benefactor. The boys are not now maintained by the Dean and Chapter, but receive very inadequate stipends in lieu of board. When first admitted, they have, as super-numeraries, £2 per annum; the next four boys have £5 per annum; the next four £10. The advance of salary they have of course by rotation. The super-numerary is always accepted as a Chorister.

The head-boy, I was glad to perceive, was qualified, in the absence of the organist, to supply his place very respectably on the organ. Two of the superannuated Choristers had been re-admitted into the Choir, as super-numeraries, in a situation nearly corresponding with that of Bible-clerks at the Universities, and were appointed to read the First Lesson; and another, who had just quitted the Music School, was preparing to enter the University.

In the ‘Additions and corrections’ to her ‘Brief Account,’ Miss Hackett says:

An old Norman chamber abutting on the Cathedral has been converted into an excellent, well-lighted School-room, and the ancient monastic dormitories over the cloisters have been repaired and fitted up as a Music School and Class-rooms. An improved system of education has been adopted. An examination, including music, is held twice yearly by the Dean and the Precentor, when prizes are awarded, and a printed Report is published.

Four of the Choristers dine alternately at the Deanery every Sunday, and all of them are taught instrumental music at the expense of the Dean and Chapter.

At the present time there is no residential choir school at Norwich, but the boys are carefully educated and cared for by Mr. J. H. Brockbank, one of the lay-clerks and the possessor of a fine, deep bass voice. We have pleasure in giving a copy of the report of H.M. Inspector, at July last, as to the efficiency of the education which the boys receive:

The usual excellent features are fully maintained and the boys show that they have acquired sound habits of industry and self-reliance. The papers worked in Geography and History were particularly meritorious. The class of junior boys contains much promising material, it has been very well taught, and the boys show a very agreeable readiness and co-operation in their school work.

The choristers do not wear surplices except on Sundays and Saints’ Days and their Eves, their daily ‘garment of praise’ being a violet cassock. On the occasion of our visit the trio ‘Jesus, Heavenly Master,’ from Spohr’s ‘Calvary,’ was sung by six boys (two to each part) with unaffected purity of voice and complete mastery of its difficulties. Every service is preluded by ‘Lead me, Lord’ (from S. S. Wesley’s anthem, ‘Praise the Lord, O my soul’), sung, unaccompanied, by the choir in the south transept before the procession starts. When the last chord of this devotional strain—perfect in its appropriate simplicity—dies away, the organ voluntary is begun and the choir and clergy proceed to their places. For many years during the last century the whole choir sat in the organ gallery on Sundays, and not in their usual places in the stalls. The change to the recognised location was made by the late Dean Goulburn in 1867, soon after he began his beneficent régime in the administration of the Cathedral.

Of all English cathedrals Norwich can boast the greatest antiquity in regard to the office of organist. With singular appropriateness the name of its first known chief-musician was Adam. In the Sacrist's Roll of the year 1333 there is a payment of Cobbald, or Cobold, or Cobhold, as his name is variously spelled in the records. He was appointed in January, 1560, and held the organistship till 1608, when he became a singing-man. He died at Beccles (November 7, 1639), and is buried in the xiiiis iiij*d* for a robe 'for Adam the organist.' His habiliment must have been made of nothing less than red samite (a kind of heavy silk stuff) and miniver. It would be interesting to know the kind of instrument upon which Organist Adam exercised his skill, but this information, alas! is not possible. Passing over Henry Baker,—who held office in 1593—we come to a Norwich native named William Cobbold, or

Parish Church of that town, under a flat stone at the east end of the Church bearing this inscription:

Here lyeth the body of William Cobbold, sometimes Organist of Christ Church, in Norwich, who died the 7th of November, 1639.

The body rest here
But the soule above
Sing heavenly anthems
Made of peace and love.

Cobbold bequeathed 'to the Canons, singing-men and queristers of the Cathedral of Christ Church [Norwich] within the quere, 20s.' He also left the sum of 6s. 8d. to Thomas Purton, one of his fellow singing-men, who died before he could enjoy this lawyer-fee legacy. Cobbold contributed to Este's 'Book of Psalms' (1592) and to the 'Triumphs of Oriana' (printed 1601, published 1603), the latter publication containing a madrigal by him 'With wreathes of rose and laurel.' There was another Norwich Cathedral contributor to this collection, Richard Carlton—he was about that time Master of the Choristers.

To Cobbold succeeded William Inglott (1554-1621), who held the office of organist for thirteen years—1608 to 1621. Three members of the Inglott family were connected with the music of the Cathedral at one time—Edmond, father and son of the same name, both Masters and tutors of the Choristers, and William. The last-named (the organist) not only had a great reputation as a performer on the organ and virginals, but he contributed two pieces—'A Gaillard Ground' and 'The Leaues bee greene'—to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, and also to Will. Forster's collection of Virginal music, if the name 'Englitt' is, as seems quite probable, a variant of his patronymic. William Inglott was buried in the nave of the Cathedral. On a pillar near the organ screen is a monument to him which Dr. Croft, as a mark of his esteem for Inglott's merits, caused to be repaired. We give (on the opposite page) a facsimile of the beautiful engraving of this monument in Sir Thomas Browne's 'Repertorium' (1712).

The next organist of note was Richard Ayleward, who began to reign concurrently with Charles II. He was the son of a Minor Canon of, and became a chorister at, Winchester Cathedral. He composed a special anthem (the MS. of which is in Dr. Mann's possession) entitled 'The King shall rejoice,' for the Restoration Thanksgiving Service held in the Cathedral on May 20, 1660. Ayleward died in October, 1679. Mr. Taphouse possesses a volume of music entirely in the handwriting of Richard Ayleward—a Collection of Allmaines, Corantes, Sarabands, Jiggs, Variones and Passionate Ayres for the Harpsichord, most of them signed by Ayleward. The book also contains some directions for tuning the harpsichord according to equal temperament, which shows that at so early a period as the 17th century a Norwich organist gave attention to so complicated a subject. We may pass over the names of Thomas Pleasants, James Cooper, Humphrey Cotton, and Thomas Garland, —a quartet of chief musicians who held office for two full scores of years and are all buried, as well as Ayleward, in the Cathedral—and come to the Beckwiths, father and son.

The elder Beckwith was known as John Christmas Beckwith, though his second name was perchance bestowed as a nickname by reason of his having probably been born on Christmas Day (at Norwich, 1750). He studied under Hayes at Oxford, and was an exceptionally fine extempore player, excelling in impromptu fugues, in addition to being a good painter. Beckwith, who only held the Norwich organistship for less than a year,—August, 1808, to his death in June, 1809, though he had been Master of the Choristers for some time previously—was one of the earliest, if not the first, to compile a Pointed Psalter. In his publication entitled 'The First verse of every Psalm of David with an ancient or modern chant in score adapted as much as possible to the sentiment of each Psalm by J. Beckwith, Mus. Doc. Oxon.' (1808), he sets forth the following in the form of a 'strong recommendation':

Suppose the organist and choir were to meet every morning and afternoon for one month, and agree on the proper place in each verse of the Psalms where the reciting should end in both the first and last parts of the chant, and under that particular word or syllable place a conspicuous red mark: if one book were thus carefully marked, the others might be rendered similar to it. The benefit would be, all the members of the choir might recite as one person, and all come together to that word which they are previously sure is the most proper to end the recital.

We now come to the best known organist of Norwich, in the person of Zechariah Buck. A native of the city, he was officially connected with the Cathedral for the long period of seventy years! He began as a chorister, and was articled to John Charles Beckwith, the son of Dr. Beckwith, whom he succeeded as organist in 1819 (aged 21), a post he held for fifty-eight years. Although it is more than probable that Dr. Buck would not be able to satisfy present-day examiners of the Royal College of Organists in organ-playing, he made an extraordinary reputation as a trainer of boys' voices. His methods, though peculiar, if not eccentric, were remarkably resultful. We learn from Mr. F. G. Kitton's biography of the old organist that

In order that the boys should open their mouths, he resorted to the use of beans, marbles, nuts, acorns, coffee-berries, &c.; but the nuts proved a decided failure, as the boys were always cracking them. At length the excellent idea occurred to the ingenious Doctor to experiment with a neat wooden mouthpiece, in the exact shape of the mouth, and to fit in with the teeth. These mouthpieces resembled, both in size and form, the segment of an orange; they were hollow, and the exterior surfaces had grooves for the teeth. The mouthpieces, which answered the desired purpose admirably, were made of boxwood by B. W. Spaul, an ecclesiastical builder in the Cathedral Close, and were sold at sixpence each. Some of the Doctor's private pupils had their mouthpieces reproduced in silver. These contrivances, with penny looking-glasses, were handed round to the boys at their morning practice for the exercise work, which was superintended by Buck himself, or, in his absence, by one of his articulated pupils.

Dr. Bunnett—organist to the Corporation, and of St. Peter Mancroft, and to the Festivals—was assistant to Dr. Buck and rendered invaluable service as assistant-organist of the Cathedral for many years.

Old Dr. Buck was insistently particular that his little cherubs should sing with poetic feeling. Here again he adopted original methods. On one occasion, when teaching a boy to sing Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' he could not get the young gentleman to realize the full meaning of the words 'Without Thee, all is dark,' so he shut him up in a large music-cupboard in order that absolute darkness might be felt. The worthy Doctor, closing the door, said triumphantly 'Now, my boy, can you realize better the darkness?' 'Please sir, No sir,' was the reply, 'There's a crack in the door'!

The late Mr. James Valentine Cox, a member of the choir for sixty years, thus records the vocal agility of Norwich choristers and singing-men half a century ago:

About 1840-50, the music of the Cathedral was rendered very differently from the way in which it is now. Then everything was done in the most florid style—viz., grace notes, cadenzas, shakes (single, double, and triple), while time was not much considered. Indeed, some of the treble solos were nearly sung ad libitum. . . . In the anthems I have heard three boys making 'shakes' simultaneously; and not only the boys, but the lay-clerks used to 'shake' most extensively. There was one lay-clerk—Mr. William Smith—who had so good a 'shake,' that he was requested not to forget it at the service, as the ladies so much admired it ! I have known him begin a solo with an elaborate 'shake,' and end with one, besides introducing two or three in the middle of an anthem. In fact, 'shakes' were so numerous that they must have shaken the Cathedral to its very foundation !

It is no wonder that the general education of the poor little choristers was greatly neglected, owing to the time they had to give to the innumerable practisings insisted upon by Dr. Buck. He was very particular as to his choristers' diet, especially when a boy had to sing a solo. On one occasion a Norfolk clergyman asked Dr. Buck to lend him a solo boy to take part in a performance of 'Elijah.' The choice fell upon Master A. R. Gaul, who had the honour of being invited to dine—sitting at a side table—with the clerical concert-giver before the performance. In the course of the dinner a note arrived for the host, who proceeded to read it aloud before his assembled guests. It read thus :

Dear Sir,

Please don't let little Gaul have any pudding.

Yours faithfully,

Z. BUCK.

Dr. Frank Bates, the present organist, was born at March, Cambridgeshire, January 13, 1856. After having been assistant-organist of Holy Trinity Church, Leamington, he became (aged 18) organist of St. Baldred's Episcopal Church, North Berwick. There he was very successful in training a choir of fisher boys, and after eight years at North Berwick, he was appointed organist and choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church, Edinburgh. He took his degree of Mus. B. at Dublin in 1880, and two years later the further distinction of Doctor, being then one of the youngest doctors of music in the United Kingdom. For the latter degree he composed an oratorio entitled 'Selections from the history of Samuel.' In December, 1885, from among 118 candidates, Dr. Bates was appointed organist and 'musical-master' (to give the official designation in the Chapter records) of the choristers of Norwich Cathedral, a position he has held with credit to himself and in pleasant co-operation with his colleagues for nearly nineteen years. Since 1900 he has successfully conducted the Norwich Philharmonic Society, and, since 1901, the Norwich Choral Society, formerly the Old Gate House Choir : and in various other ways he takes part in the musical activities of the city. He lives in a charming Elizabethan house in the Close, a delightful habitation which more than one American has expressed his desire to remove bodily to 'the other side' !

For kind help rendered in the preparation of this article, the writer's thanks are tendered to Dr. A. H. Mann, organist of King's College, Cambridge, conductor of the Norwich Festival Society's concerts, and chorus-master to the Festival ; to Dr. W. T. Bensly, Chapter Clerk of Norwich ; to Dr. Frank Bates, Organist and Musical-master of the Choristers of the Cathedral ; and to Mr. A. E. Coe, of London Street, Norwich, for his excellent photographs.

DOTTED CROCHET.

JOHN DUNSTABLE.

The unveiling of a monument to John Dunstable by London musicians may serve as an occasion for a few remarks concerning him and the position he holds in musical history. Nothing certain is known of him, except the date of his death, Christmas Eve, 1453. It is probable, though not absolutely certain, that he was born at Dunstable in Bedfordshire, where there was a wealthy and important monastery ; he may have taken his name from this, but surnames were then getting permanent, bequeathed from father to son. For instance, Simon Tunsted, born at Norwich, but named after his father from Tunsted, is a case, and an older one. The name John Dunstable is also found among the monks of St. Albans, but this was in the 14th century under Abbot Hugh, who died in 1326. More to the point is the record of a grant made in 1436, giving 'liberam warrennam in Stepilmorden et Gildenmorden in com. Cantabr.' to 'Joh. Dunstaple, armiger.' This may have been the astronomer-composer, but I think the probabilities are against it. Long before 1436, Dunstable was celebrated all over Western Europe, except perhaps Germany. It appears probable that he was born about 1380.

His position in musical history is more interesting than speculations concerning his biography. He flourished in the early 15th century, the period when the problem of artistic musical composition was at last solved ; and in my opinion the ancient statements, that it was Dunstable who solved the problem, are correct. Walter Odington, who was living at Oxford in 1316 and 1330, left a most complete treatise on the music of his day; Simon Tunsted, or one of his friars, wrote another in 1351; but neither of these writers mentions Imitation, Passing-notes, or Suspensions, and without these resources it was impossible for music to become an independent structural art, able to bear analysis on its own account. But all this constructive material is found in Dunstable's works. In addition, consecutive fifths and octaves are forbidden; and the meaningless ugly dissonances of older attempts have disappeared. I do not know a single earlier attempt of which the 'harmony' is even bearable, except some pieces in a MS. at Cambridge.* And yet, scarcely fifty years after the date when Tunsted's treatise was completed, the mighty change had been brought about. How was this achieved?

About this time a school of clever experimenters existed among the organists of Florence. Some of their works exist in the British Museum† (Additional MS. 29987), dating perhaps towards 1450. Others are preserved at Paris and in Italy. Ambros judged that these men looked too far forward; they had an inkling of modern dramatic expression, and foreshadowed the early 17th century innovating musicians of Florence. But they could not progress, because the structural resources were not yet in use; and very soon afterwards the Italians gave up music altogether for many years, in fact till the 16th century. Some of these earliest Florentine writers in their experiments occasionally made very lucky shots at true part-writing; it has been generally believed that Dunstable had visited Italy, possibly (as Dr. Wilhelm Nagel suggests) along with Lionel Power, and he may have taken hints from hearing these effects. But we know nothing certainly, though the assertion on Dunstable's epitaph that he was the man who 'scattered the sweet arts' of music 'through the world' suggests his visiting the Continent. Let us turn to recorded facts.

Tinctoris, writing about 1480, asserts that it was the institution of Chapels Royal, attracting men of genius, that brought about the great improvement of music, so great that it seemed as a new art, which new art first arose among the English, whose chief was Dunstable. Here we find something tangible, by a trustworthy authority. He tells us that the art of composition arose from the establishing of the English Chapel Royal. When was the English Chapel Royal instituted? The earliest reference I have been able to find is in 1417. Several names are incidentally mentioned, but they are otherwise unknown. It appears to me that we may reasonably suppose Dunstable was a member of this Chapel Royal, 'plena cantoribus ampla capella,' as a eulogy of Henry V. calls it. Through daily hearing the effects produced by this large body of voices, and their extemporised 'discant,' a man of genius would develop the sense of distinction between pleasing and unpleasing successions of chords, which the older musicians appear never even to have thought of. The art of independent and correct part-writing required higher powers and real invention, but Dunstable at any rate had acquired it long before 1430. The Agincourt Song was written before 1422. Haberl judges that Dufay was already acquainted with Dunstable's works before he went to Rome in 1428; and between 1430-40 there was a choir-book written for Trent Cathedral in the Tyrol, which contains ten of Dunstable's works, besides fourteen by Power and other Englishmen, so quickly had the 'new art' spread! Martin le Franc,* in 1437, confessed that the best musicians of his own Paris were beaten by Dufay and Binchois, who copied Dunstable's 'nouvelle pratique.' Later writers of the 15th century—English, Flemish, or Spanish—always give Dunstable the earliest place among musicians. Finally, the French poet Eloy d'Amerval, in his vision of paradise (published 1508) describes how in heaven Dunstable, Dufay, and other great musicians continually compose hymns of praise for the saints and angels.

The sad destruction of English service-books at the Reformation doubtless is the reason for the disappearance of Dunstable's works, which were, except fragments, quite unknown till recently. But a very large number has lately been discovered at Rome, Trent, Bologna, and elsewhere on the Continent, above all at Modena. English MSS. of the 15th century are rare, and very often the pieces preserved are anonymous. There is an incomplete Mass for three voices† at Cambridge; it is complete in the Trent MSS. No composer is mentioned in the carol-books preserved in the Selden MSS. at Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge; one piece in the former is found in the Modena MSS., and ascribed to Dunstable. There are, however, works by both Dunstable and Power in the Old Hall MS. recently brought to light by Mr. Barclay Squire. Dunstable's astronomical calculations are preserved in the Laud MSS. His three-voiced piece 'O rosa bella' has been published in various works; four sacred compositions from Bologna have been facsimiled by the Plain-song and Mediaeval Music Society, and eight are printed in the Denkmaeler der Tonkunst in Oesterreich with a facsimile of the Trent version of 'O rosa bella.' A thematic catalogue of all the known works, compiled by Miss Stainer, may be seen in the second volume of the Internationale Musik-Gesellschaft, p. 9.

Two epitaphs on Dunstable exist; one, now restored, was placed on his grave in London; the

* See No. 1772 in the Catalogue (revised) of the recent Exhibition at Fishmongers' Hall. It is not safe to conclude that lines of music written like a modern score were certainly intended to be sung simultaneously; they should be compared with the lines of poetry.

† When cataloguing the English Virginal-books in the Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte for 1902, I drew attention to this important MS., hitherto neglected.

* Naumann, in his 'Illustrated History of Music,' quoted the lines confessing the supremacy of Dufay and Binchois, but carefully suppressed the passage concerning their English model. Dufay is Naumann's hero.

other was written by Abbot Wheathamstead, whose epitaphs were printed by Weever from the Cotton MS. Otho B 4, ruined by a fire at the binder's in 1865. Both epitaphs ascribe such extraordinary genius and virtue to Dunstable, that, as Fuller says, they must necessarily allude to the same man, for it would bankrupt nature to produce two such amazing prodigies.

Before concluding, it may not be superfluous if I add a few remarks concerning the Gymel. Several German historians have written at length upon this supposed English style. They have credited the assertion of Gulielmus Monachus, whose treatise purports to teach composition after the true English styles—in fact, 'English as she is composed'—these styles being Faulxbourdon for three voices and Gymel for two. But Gymel, or Gimel, often marked in English 15th and 16th century MSS., seems rather to denote divisi. The importance attributed to Gymel in the development of harmony is quite unjustified.

That it should have taken several centuries after Hucbald and Guido before the problem of musical composition was solved may appear strange; but it should be remembered that until Walter Odington's time the tuning followed was that of Boethius, which was unsuitable to harmony, and made thirds discordant. We find from the exhaustive treatises of Odington, Tunsted, and Johannes de Grochæus that the necessary means for composition had not been invented in 1350, nor the laws discovered; but all was accomplished by 1430. Who did it? 15th and 16th century writers said it was Dunstable; and so did the historians Martini, Hawkins, and Burney. Through a careless misstatement of Baini's in 1828, Dufay was for some time credited with the priority of the invention; the correction, first made by Arnold in 1867, and subsequently confirmed by Kade, Eitner, Haberl, and others, has shown that Dufay was a later musician, that the ancient statements were correct, and the priority of the invention justly belongs to John Dunstable, Tua laus, tua lux, tua Musica princeps.

Someone may ask, 'If these are your opinions, how do you explain "Sumer is icumen in," of which at least the tune was written about the year 1226?' All I can answer is, that the more one speculates on the origin of that wonderful piece the more puzzled one gets. Let a curious reader wade through the many pages which Dr. Nagel devoted to the subject in his 'Geschichte der Musik in England,' and he will begin to realise how insoluble that problem is.

H. DAVEY.

Dr. Henry Hiles died, we regret to record, at Worthing, on October 20, in his seventy-eighth year. He had recently left Manchester—where he had spent forty-five years of professional life and where he was greatly esteemed—and had settled at Pinner, in order to enjoy a more leisured life after a long and honourable career. As a composer Dr. Hiles is best known by his fine glee, 'Hushed in death.' A biographical sketch of him, the materials for which he personally supplied, with a special portrait, appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of July, 1900.

Occasional Notes.

Has a man no Music in him? he will never become a poet; has he no Poetry in him? he will never become a musician. The old writer uttered a deep truth when he quaintly defined Poetry as 'Reason joined with Musick': and we may justly add that Music is 'Poetry and Painting in sound': Poetry, because its merit lies in the ideality of its aims and the beauty of proportion in its construction and form; Painting, because it enables us to call up vividly scenes which painters have ever essayed to put on canvas, though they have perhaps never realized them to the fullest. Great poets and musicians are of 'the few who ennoble the many,' and they probably do more than any other artists to save humanity from a saddening and pessimistic view of life, of the dread struggle for existence going on around us.

JOHN STAINER.

Names and personalities, even in music, so soon pass out of memory that the name of Jules—subsequently Sir Julius—Benedict is comparatively forgotten. As the centenary of his birth falls due on November 27, the occasion may serve to recall the name of a musician who, not so very long ago, was a very prominent figure in English musical life. Although Benedict was a German—he was born at Stuttgart, November 27, 1804—he made his chief success as a composer in an Irish opera, 'The Lily of Killarney,' which, despite its old age (as operas go), still retains its popularity. The first performance of 'The Lily of Killarney' took place at the Royal English Opera, Covent Garden, on February 10, 1862. Alfred Mellon conducted, and the principal vocalists included the sisters Louisa and Susan Pyne, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Henry Haigh, and Mr. Santley, the last-named, in the rôle of Danny Mann, singing in the familiar duet 'The moon has raised her lamp above.' The Times eulogised the work, saying that it 'fairly earned the unequivocal success it obtained,' while the Musical World—the criticisms in both journals doubtless being from the pen of Mr. J. W. Davison—said:

We have no hesitation in pronouncing Mr. Benedict's new opera a veritable masterpiece, and the work alike of a profound artist and an original thinker. If the composer has been occasionally restricted in his aspirations by the somewhat conflicting elements of the story [by Dion Boucicault], and the special character and couleur locale of lowly Irish life, he has in many instances triumphed over all obstacles, and literally competed with the old Irish composers themselves in the sweetness, wildness, and plaintiveness of their melodies. In the two ballads of Eily, 'In my own mountain valley' and 'I'm alone,' Hardress Cregan's song 'Eily Mavoureen,' and Myles's 'Lament,' in the first act, Mr. Benedict has caught the very spirit of Irish melody. But the music is all beautiful.

Could higher praise be given? For the Birmingham Festival of 1870 Benedict composed his oratorio of 'St. Peter,' a work which contains some music that should not be forgotten, e.g., the soprano air 'I mourn as a dove,' and the melodious chorus 'The Lord be a lamp unto my feet.' A favourite pupil of Weber, Benedict lived the life of a busy musician in England for fifty years. He was knighted by Queen Victoria in 1871, and died, in London, June 5, 1885, aged eighty, his remains being interred in Kensal Green Cemetery.

The death, on October 16, of Mr. Charles Morton, at the age of eighty-five, recalls the fact that he was the first to introduce the music of Gounod's 'Faust' to an English audience. This happened more than forty-four years ago, the performance taking place, not in a theatre, but at the Canterbury Music Hall, Westminster Bridge Road, of which Mr. Morton was at that time the lessee. Not much information is obtainable about these initial representations, but an advertisement in the Daily Telegraph of April 24, 1860, is important. Here it is:

CANTERBURY HALL CONCERTS—The Royal Academy over the water.

This evening will be performed (first time in this country) C. P. Gounod's opera 'Faust.' Faust, Mr. H. Herbert; Mephistopheles, Mr. C. Bernard; Marguerite, Miss Russell; Siebel, Mrs. Anderson; and an efficient chorus.

Henry F. Chorley, a warm admirer of Gounod, referred to the performances in these terms:

We must return to offer a word or two on the selection from M. Gounod's 'Faust,' given at Canterbury Hall, since Mr. Morton's enterprise merits every possible credit; and its success (in this case) is . . . more than commonly grateful to those whose belief in a new and real artist has never wavered, countless though the assaults and sarcasms on the subject have been.

Chorley regarded the Soldiers' Chorus as 'an inspiration, if ever there was such a thing,' and then went on to say:

The music is found to be bright, buoyant and real . . . and the effect produced must surprise even those who are as thoroughly satisfied of its intrinsic excellences as ourselves.

The Canterbury Hall performances—of apparently only a selection from the work—preceded by three years the first representation of 'Faust' at an opera house in London. This took place at Her Majesty's Theatre on June 11, 1863, in the presence of the composer, but the performance was conducted by Arditì. In one of the 'Haymarket Nursery Rhymes' which enlivened the columns of the Musical World forty years ago, Arditì is thus poetised as a time-beater:

There was a conductor, Arditì,
Who, like a Scotch poet called Beattie
Believed that his name
Would descend down to fame,
But, like Beattie, was wrong—this Arditì.

On Saturday, October 8, was unveiled a mural tablet erected to the memory of John Dunstable in St. Stephen's Church, Walbrook. Dunstable, a pioneer creative native musician, died on Christmas Eve, 1453, and was buried in the former church of St. Stephen, Walbrook, which perished in the Great Fire of 1666. He had an European reputation, and the action of the London Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians in erecting the monument to Dunstable's memory is highly commendable. The memorial is a chaste specimen of glass mosaic: the upper panel contains three figures of angel musicians against a starry sky, symbolic of the fame of Dunstable as a master of music and as an astronomer, while the lower panel records the restored inscription of his tombstone. Concerning the latter, Dr. Charles Maclean has drawn up an elaborate report as to the exact wording of the original epitaph. An article, by Mr. Henry Davey, on John Dunstable will be found on page 712.

A provincial newspaper states that a certain Choral Society intends to produce Elijah's 'King Olaf'!

Mr. Robert A. Marr, of Edinburgh, an amateur keenly interested in music and musical literature, has recently presented to the Corporation of Edinburgh the rare print of Giuseppe Puppo, a violinist, born in 1749, died in 1827. This gentleman was a popular teacher in 'Auld Reekie' near the latter part of the 18th century, and from 1778-82 he held the post of leader of the St. Cecilia's Orchestra in the Scottish capital. A well-known character in his day, Signor Puppo had the reputation of saying smart things, one of them being 'Boccherini is the wife of Haydn.' His Puppo patronymic naturally lent itself to facetious treatment, for he was nicknamed 'Puppy.' Further information concerning Signor Puppo will be found in Dr. D. F. Harris's 'Saint Cecilia's Hall in the Niddry Wynd' (reviewed in THE MUSICAL TIMES of March, 1900), an interesting volume published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, Edinburgh, by whose permission we are enabled to give a reduced facsimile of the 'Puppy' caricature which Mr. Marr has kindly given to the public.

Some journalistic echoes of the Leeds Musical Festival:

Mr. Boye Parker at the head of the violins.
A vigorous Coon Song is sung by the baritone.
Sir Edwards's Overture was played magnificently.

The following telegram was recently received by a certain firm of music-publishers:

Send to P.O. Northallerton two bound daughters.
Moody Marriners.

One of the witty sayings of the late Percy Betts:

Man wants but little Herr Bülow,
Nor wants that little long.

Whatever may be thought of the various newspaper criticisms of the Leeds Festival performances, not one of them is quite so outspoken as the following notice (from the Musical World of October 19, 1843) of one of the concerts at the Edinburgh Musical Festival held sixty-one years ago :

Saturday Morning.

DEAR WORLD.—At the fifth performance last night, we had his Royal Highness the Duke of Bordeaux, who made himself very conspicuous, by conversing all the evening in a loud tone, with Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and sundry ladies, and by rising up while the Jubilee overture was singing "God save the Queen." The "Pastorale" symphony was well rendered, and the Guillaume Tell overture no less so. The most curious exhibition of the evening, was something styled in the programme :—

New Manuscript Concerto, Dr. Gauntlett Gauntlett.

which, as far as I could make out, consisted of some Scotch tunes and a fragment of a pedal figure, by Bach—and nothing more. Upon my enquiring the meaning of this hodge-podge being called a concerto, I was told that Dr. Gauntlett had intended to play a new organ concerto, with orchestral accompaniments, of his own composition, but that, through the negligence or the ignorance of the gentleman who built the organ, under whose superintendence (or under Dr. Gauntlett's), it was placed during the festival, the pitch of the organ had been miscalculated about half a tone ; id est, it was a half tone flatter than the pitch of the Philharmonic orchestra (to which Dr. Gauntlett, in playing his concertos, is so much accustomed), consequently, Dr. Gauntlett could not manage his concerto for want of the orchestral accompaniments, which, by reason of variance of pitch, could not possibly be given. This was of no consequence in the Messiah, &c., &c., when the organ was entrusted to Mr. C. Hargitt (poor devil !) though the orchestra was pitched just as philharmonically, and the organ as unphilharmonically as if the "New concerto (M.S.), organ, Dr. Gauntlett,—GAUNTLETT"—itself had been at work. It however explained to me why a Scotch jig and a pedal fugue mutilated, were entitled in the programme "a new concerto," and of course I was perfectly satisfied with the explanation.

Adieu—Ever your's, S—.

The San Carlo Grand Opera Company, from Naples, which commenced a six weeks' season at Covent Garden on Monday, October 17, under the direction of Mr. Henry Russell, has given successful performances and attracted good audiences. The first week, with one exception, was devoted to Puccini and Verdi, the former represented by 'Manon Lescaut' and 'La Tosca,' the latter by 'Rigoletto' and 'Aida.' The selection of these works was wise, for Puccini is one of the prominent Italian composers of the day, and certainly one of the most successful, while of the operas of Verdi the first is the most popular, the second the most interesting of all his stage works. The performances were all very good ; not only were the chief rôles well filled, but everyone, the excellent chorus included, seemed to be thinking of the ensemble effect, not merely of their own particular parts. Signor Caruso, who has been engaged, is of course not a regular member of the San Carlo Company ; as Des Grieux in 'Manon' he sang magnificently, and acted with fine force and feeling. In a performance of 'Carmen,' the title-rôle was taken by Madame Gianoli, who acts well, and Don José by Caruso. Signori Campanini and Tanara are both admirable conductors. To this notice of an enterprise which deserves all encouragement, we may add that Signor Puccini was present at the performances of both his works, and that he was called on to the stage and heartily applauded.

The subject of Bar-lines — treated of by Dr. Cummings in an article he contributed to our September issue — has brought two interesting communications, one from the Rev. S. Gregory Ould, the other from Mr. Henry Davey. The former writes as follows :

In regard to Bar-lines, I do not remember any mention having been made of the use of bar-lines to show the separation of word from word in music before printers took to using hyphens. These bar-lines had no time value. A random example will show their use.

Mr. Henry Davey, in his communication, says :

Perhaps some of your correspondents can tell us whether Bar-lines are used in Petrucci's lute books, published in 1507 and later. The only copies mentioned in Eitner's 'Quellen Lexikon' are at Berlin, Vienna, and Brussels. I believe bar-lines were customary in early lute music and harpsichord music, but never in part-books for viols, &c., nor in vocal part-books. Bar-lines are often used in the 16th century English virginal (or organ) books, beginning with Royal MSS., Appendix 58, written about 1510. The earliest publication of vocal scores seems to be Cipriano di Rore's madrigals in 1577 ; they are barred.

The recent National Brass Band Festival held at the Crystal Palace attracted more than usual attention by the fact that a band outside the 'crack' circle gained the prize. The test-piece on that contesting occasion was a 'Grand Selection,' entitled 'Gems of Mendelssohn.' Let us look into it. This pot pourri opens with thirty-two bars of the War March from 'Athalie,' which, by the aid of a dominant seventh chord, is grafted on to 'If with all your hearts' (in the key of F), the melody assigned to 'Euphonium solo.' To this succeeds No. 30 of the 'Songs without Words,' but transposed into F, and played as a cornet solo. Without any break the full band is heard in twenty-nine bars from the Presto section of the Andante and Rondo Capriccioso for Pianoforte (Op. 14), its second subject, but in B flat instead of E. The 'Clown's Dance' (in G) and the Notturmo (in C, from the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music follows) and in due course these give place to the Fugue movement, in its original key, of the Second Organ Sonata. A foot-note says : 'The Fuga is only intended to be played at first-class contests : at other times it had better be omitted.' A less fugitive touch is provided in the duet 'Zuleika and Hassan' (in C), played by solo cornet and solo trombone, while No. 26 of the 'Songs without Words' (but in F) furnishes Allegro con fuoco material for the final 'Gem.' It seems a curious mixture, but as a test-piece the selection doubtless answered its competitive purpose. One wonders what Mendelssohn would have thought of it.

The present number of THE MUSICAL TIMES is enlarged to seventy-six pages.

MENDELSSOHN'S SCOTCH SYMPHONY.

(IN A MINOR. OP. 56.)

BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.Vivace non troppo.Adagio.Allegro vivacissimo, and Allegro maestoso assai.

III.—From the Andante to the Vivace (non troppo,* as if to warn the conductor against the too great speed which it is difficult to avoid) the transition is in every way sudden and delightful. The violins finish the Andante in A minor; and then, with hardly a pause ('attacca'), begin the Vivace in F; and almost immediately, as if they could not keep it in, the flutes, bassoons and horns begin calling out (each in their own proper octaves) the first interval of the subject.† Then the subject itself begins, in the favoured clarinet again, with the accompaniment of the strings alone, always Assai leggiero e staccato—as light and piquant as the bows can make it:—

Notice the long holding note of the clarinet on C (see a, No. 10)—continued after the flutes and oboes have taken up the theme—with its descent by B flat to A. Notice too the fact that this movement, like the Introduction, begins with the reedy wind instruments, as if alluding to the Scotch music; and that it is not until they have had their full turn that the strings take a prominent place. The strings, however, have the second subject to themselves—and a beautiful crisp theme it is—until the oboes and clarinets make their entry again—

* It will be observed that in the original tempi, printed in the Preface to the score and already quoted in these remarks, this is given as Assai vivace—very lively.

† This transition passage is said to have been—like so many of the best things in Art—an afterthought, and to have been put in after the first performance in London.

followed by the flutes and bassoons, all racing off after each other as if they were Highlanders themselves on their springy native heath.

There are some other points in the Scherzo which must be noticed: as, for instance, where the clarinet growls out the theme in its lowest tones; or the bit of bassoon solo, where the two subjects seem almost to be wrestling with each other; some passages where the phrase is tossed about between the violoncellos and other instruments; also, especially a place (immediately before the reprise) where, after it has begun quietly in the flute, the violins answer, first with a sudden B flat and then with a B natural sfz., and with all the effect of eagles screaming in the air; and lastly, the close, when, with elastic steps, the mass of men march off, till their retreating footsteps die away in the distance.

I cannot forbear further quoting a melody which makes its appearance near the close, and which is the very acme of elasticity and agility:—

the plaintive tone of which surmounts the staccato accompaniment of the fiddles, and the alternate fragments of the principal theme. This is an instance, rare in Mendelssohn, of the use of the repetition figure, which under the name of Ribattuta was a favourite with the older composers.

IV.—Between the Scherzo and the slow movement which succeeds it there is again no pause. The Adagio begins with arpeggios in the second violins and violas, dividing a recurring phrase of marked rhythm in the horns, until at length after a little prelude of the first violins this passionate Song-without-words reveals itself:—

THE CHAPEL AT HOLYROOD, WHERE MENDELSSOHN FOUND THE OPENING THEME OF HIS SCOTCH SYMPHONY.

(Kindly photographed specially for THE MUSICAL TIMES by Mr. John Cowan, of Edinburgh.)

The song ends at (a). The little phrase with which it seems twice over to say good-bye—by musicians called a codetta—is taken almost note for note from a similar place in the Adagio of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74), where, too, Beethoven repeats it—a rare thing with him, though a more favourite one with Mendelssohn. A somewhat similar codetta is found in the Andante religioso of Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 4.

To this theme the 'second subject' immediately succeeds, in the rhythm hinted by the horns at the opening:—

No. 16.

Horns & Clarinets.

cres. f sf p &c.

This theme is as martial as the other is passionate, and the change suggests that its author may have had the same thought in his mind as Sir Walter Scott had when he calls on the 'Harp of the North'

To bid a warrior smile, or teach a maid to weep.

The first subject is twice repeated—once on the horn and violoncello, and again on the flute and violin—each time with a varied running accompaniment in the strings, and with every artifice possible in other parts of the orchestra. One of these, where the violins and flutes are the chief accompanists of the melody, it is impossible to help quoting:—

cres. sf

V.—The customary pause is once more omitted before the Finale, Allegro vivacissimo—or, as it is given in the preface in the score, Allegro guerriero—an indication of military character which is amply borne out by the wild and energetic character of the opening subject, where the peculiarity of the scale already noticed will be again observed :—

This is accompanied by the bassoons and horns in groups of four staccato crotchets in a bar.

One of the ideas which crowd this Finale is found in the following passage, alla marcia, interposed between two occurrences of the theme last quoted :—

Another, commencing as follows, is first presented fortissimo with the whole strength of the orchestra, though afterwards employed with entirely different effect in a piquant fugato passage in the latter half of the movement :—

The 'second subject' proper is announced by the oboes and clarinets with the accompaniment of the first violins only on a B below, to which (in the second half) is added the flute on the B above—somewhat after the manner of the beautiful second subject in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, first movement :—

It is difficult to imagine that this plaintive love-song could ever be made to have a different effect, but so it is. Not only is the second half of the strain almost savage in its force and in the sudden manner of its appearance :—

but the first half itself is, on its later occurrence, endued with the same rough and martial force. But it has an ample revenge. Mendelssohn evidently repents for having forced it so far from its proper character, and at the close of the movement, after a long passage of the most furious and obstinate conflict, the strife calms gradually down, and the melody is once more heard in all, and more than all, its former native loveliness, as if breathed from the ideal 'pipes' of happy Highlanders who have survived the dangers of the campaign and are again safe among their native hills murmuring their loves and hopes to the women from whom they are never more to part :—

No. 22a.

Clarinet 1. Strings holding notes.

VI.—The Symphony—or, indeed, the Drama—closes with a Coda, Allegro maestoso, 6-8, so long (ninety-five bars) as to be practically a fifth independent act or movement. This theme is as follows :—

No. 23.

Marcato assai la melodia.

beginning with a phrase much employed by the old Church writers, and of which Mendelssohn was extraordinarily fond.* To some this will have the effect of an anticlimax. Others, like Robert Schumann, will find in it a highly poetic return to the mood of the Introduction—a sunset corresponding to a lovely morning.

That Mendelssohn himself set much store by this Coda, and took special pains over it, is evident from a passage in a letter of his to Ferdinand David, March 12, 1842. He wanted the first few bars to sound as definite and strong as a choir of male voices, and the melody to be perfectly distinct; and with this view he authorizes David to strengthen the horns, and, if absolutely necessary, to leave out the drum notes in the first ten bars.

* For instance, the opening of the Reformation Symphony; 'For all the nations' and 'For so hath the Lord,' in St. Paul. Others are given in the examination of the occurrences of the phrase in the Musical World for 1886.

Church and Organ Music.

'HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN'
SOME HISTORICAL NOTES.

Hymns are in fact the truest links that bind ancient and modern souls in one.

F. W. NEWMAN, in 'The Soul' (1849.)

The approaching issue of a revised edition of this widely-known hymnal may furnish the opportunity for referring to its inception and first publication. The deplorable state of hymnology in the Church of England fifty years ago caused several earnest-minded clergymen to initiate improvement by the issue of a hymnal that should meet with general acceptance. The prime movers were the Rev. F. H. Murray, of Chislehurst, and the Rev. Sir Henry W. Baker (1821-1877), vicar of Monkland, a secluded parish near Leominster, in Herefordshire. Having ascertained by private inquiries the widely-spread desire for a uniform hymn-book, Sir Henry Baker, early in 1858, associated with himself for this object several clergymen, including the editors of some existing hymnals, who agreed to give up their books in order, so far as possible, to promote the use of one. In the autumn of that year an advertisement was inserted in the Guardian (of October 27, 1858,) which read thus :

TO THE CLERGY and OTHERS interested in HYMNOLOGY.—

The Editors of several existing HYMNALS being engaged, with others, in the compilation of a Book which they hope may secure a more general acceptance from Churchmen, would be very thankful for any suggestions from persons interested in the matter. Communications may be addressed to the Secretary of the Committee, Rev. H. W. Baker, Monkland Vicarage, near Leominster.

To this advertisement more than two hundred clergymen responded. A committee was then formed who held their first meeting at St. Barnabas' Church, Pimlico, in January, 1859; and after saying the Veni Creator—invariably used at all the subsequent meetings—they began the work which has had so marked an influence upon the worship-song of the people, not only in the Church of England but in Churches of other denominations. The committee spared no pains in the work unto which they had set their hands. The reverend John Keble was among those whose advice was greatly valued: 'If you wish to make a Hymn-Book for the use of the Church,' said Keble, 'make it comprehensive.' John Mason Neale was another valued coadjutor, but the moving spirit in the whole matter was Henry Williams Baker. For nearly twenty years he was the chairman and acknowledged leader of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' He not only devoted himself to the work with whole-hearted enthusiasm, but his earnestness and ability overcame difficulties which at times seemed insuperable. His unequalled knowledge and retentive memory of hymns drew unfailing supplies of material from sources old and new, whilst he contributed to the book sacred lyrics that have become deep-rooted in the hearts of millions of worshippers. To mention a few of his hymns: 'The King of love my Shepherd is' (a beautiful paraphrase of the 23rd Psalm), 'There is a blessed home,' 'O perfect life of love!', 'I am not worthy, holy Lord,' 'Lord, Thy word abideth,' 'How welcome was the call,' 'O what, if we are Christ's.' He also composed the melody of the tune 'Stephanos,' so well known in its association with 'Art thou weary, art thou languid?'

Interesting information as to the first appearance of this well-known hymnal is furnished in the columns of the Guardian. In the issue of October 24, 1860, it is stated that 'The New Hymn-Book, now in the press, will be published at Advent.' In an advertisement on November 7 the title is still withheld, but a fortnight later it appears for the first time—'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' The Rev. Dr. Julian, in his 'Dictionary of Hymnology,' says: 'The one word Ancient in the title was a magician's wand'; but curiously enough that magical word, in conjunction with Modern, had been used, though not in a titular sense, eleven years previously by F. W. Newman in his devotional book 'The Soul' (1849)—see the lines quoted at the head of this article.

To return to the publication of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' The Guardian of November 28, 1860, announced that the first 10,000 copies were 'now ready,' and that the first part of the music edition, containing 'hymns to the end of Lent,' would be ready 'on the 26th inst.' [? prox.]. The same journal, in its issue of December 19, contained an exceedingly modest review of a hymnal of which forty-five million copies have been sold in forty years. Here is the review :

Great care and industry have evidently been bestowed on a collection of Hymns Ancient and Modern (Novello), adapted for use in the services of the Church. It contains nearly all the best hymns found in other collections, with some additions to the familiar list of 'special' occasions, such as a hymn for those at sea, and another for use in a year of deficient harvest. The new hymns are fair, though not entirely free from expressions of forced and laboured form—e.g., 'Ranks of might that never cowers.' On the whole the appearance of this collection marks a decided advance in the state of popular hymnody amongst us.—Guardian, December 19, 1860.

THE MUSICAL TIMES of November, 1860, contained this advertisement concerning the book :

The New Hymn-book, which has been long in preparation by a Committee of Clergymen, including the Editors of several existing Hymn-books, is now in the press, and will be ready by Advent. The price, bound in cloth (about 250 pages), will be 10d.; or, in quantities of not less than 100, 6d.; and in superior paper and binding, 1s. 6d. and 1s.

Applications for copies at the reduced rate to be made to Rev. Sir H. W. BAKER, Bart., Monkland Vicarage, Leominster. An edition with an accompanying Tune to each Hymn, under the musical editorship of Mr. W. H. MONK, Organist and Director of the Choir of King's College, is also in the press.—J. A. Novello, 69, Dean-street, Soho.

The first definite information as to the publication of the music edition is found in THE MUSICAL TIMES of January, 1861, where, under the heading 'During the last month, published by J. Alfred Novello,' is to be found the following :

Hymns, Ancient and Modern, for use in the Services of the Church; being the new Hymn-book that has been long in preparation by a Committee of Clergymen. Price, in cloth (270 pages), 10d.; in limp roan, red edges, 1s. 6d. An Edition, with an Accompanying Tune on each page, under the Musical Editorship of Mr. W. H. MONK. First Part, containing the Hymns to the end of Lent, is now ready, in paper cover, price 1s. 6d.

Thus it will be seen that the music edition was issued in instalments; and here it may be mentioned that Messrs. Novello not only published the first edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' but printed the book. THE MUSICAL TIMES for April, 1861, announced as 'now ready, the 35th thousand of Hymns Ancient and Modern' (words edition)—thus showing how rapidly it had come into use. The same advertisement stated, also under 'now ready,' the music edition of the hymnal—'with accompanying tunes,' to quote from the original title-page—

Price, strongly bound in cloth (368 pages) 4s. 6d.; or six copies for one guinea, from the publishers; or 30 copies for £5 (package included), to clergymen only Copies may be had with red edges, at 3d. extra, and both works [words and music editions] will shortly be ready in superior binding.

J. A. Novello, 69, Dean-street, Soho, and 35, Poultry.

The editor of the music edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' was William Henry Monk. For a long time the hymnal was known in musical circles as 'Monk's book,' indeed, one might have searched the British Museum music catalogue in vain under the heading 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' as the book was entered under Monk (W. H.). Although the original title-page stated that Monk was 'Organist and director of the choir at King's College,' he was best known as organist of St. Matthias' Church, Stoke Newington, an appointment he held for more than thirty years, from 1852 until his death, aged sixty-six, in March, 1889. In recording his hymnal editorial experiences he once said:

When contributions towards the musical edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' were invited, my house was full of the MSS. tendered for acceptance from all quarters, and the tune of which I received the greatest number of copies was an adaptation of a chorus in Weber's 'Oberon.'

This tune (of 7's metre) is a boiling down of the opening chorus sung by the Fairies in 'Oberon' ('Light as fairy foot can fall'), thus hymn-tuneized:

Needless to say the tune did not find a place in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'

Two, at least, of the tunes which Monk himself contributed to the book have become very familiar—'Eventide' ('Abide with me, fast falls the eventide') and 'St. Matthias' ('Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go'), named after the church of which the composer was organist. Monk had the rare gift of wedding sacred words to appropriate simple music—melodious and rhythmical strains that, while being congregationally easy to sing, have not the least touch of vulgarity, but are always dignified and devotional. He would sometimes get out of bed to write down a tune. His setting of 'O perfect life of love' was composed in this way, while that of 'Thou art coming, O my Saviour,' was written in a railway train. He composed his best-known tune under peculiar circumstances. When he and Sir Henry Baker were leaving one of their meetings, they suddenly remembered that there was no tune for Hymn No. 27. Monk then and there, to rectify the omission, and undisturbed by the distractions of a pianoforte lesson that was then going on, wrote, in ten minutes, the tune which is inseparably associated with Lyte's favourite evening hymn, 'Abide with me.'

The contributions of the Rev. Dr. J. B. Dykes to the first edition of the book were referred to in the October issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES (p. 646), in some notes on the tune 'Hollingside.' For the present it may suffice to state that an Appendix was added to 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' in 1868; that a revised and enlarged version appeared in 1875; and that further additions were made in 1889.

MUSIC AT THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

Liverpool was the scene of the recent Church Congress, the final meeting, held on October 7, being devoted to the subject of Church Music. Under the presidency of the Bishop of Liverpool a large audience listened to papers, musically illustrated, contributed by Dr. Walford Davies, on the Congregation and the Choir.

Dr. Madeley Richardson, on Chanting.
Dr. Basil Harwood, on Hymn-singing.
Dr. Varley Roberts, on Services and Anthems.

In pointing out the drawbacks and dangers of congregational and non-congregational church music, Dr. Walford Davies advocated that the congregation should remain seated during the singing of the anthem. Dr. Richardson rightly contended that chanting was a most beautiful development of reading. But how often it becomes a mere caricaturing of words that are incomparable in their nobility. In his address on Hymn-tunes, Dr. Harwood spoke of the necessity of restricting their compass to congregational use, though the question might well be asked 'What should be the limits of the said compass?' Unlike Dr. Walford Davies, the organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, thought that congregations should not be encouraged to sit during the anthem, as if it were not a part of their worship.

The Rev. C. H. Hylton Stewart, in the course of some remarks, said he was of opinion 'that the Royal College of Organists should, for their degrees, make the accompaniment of the service and a sound knowledge of choir-training a large part of the necessary qualification.' We may add that this is not the first time that such a compulsory requirement has been urged, and it is to be hoped that the Council of the Royal College of Organists will see their way to increase the value of their Fellowship diploma in the way indicated by Mr. Stewart at the Church Congress.

The Bishop of Liverpool, in bringing the meeting to a close, said 'if only the organists and choirmen who were present would take as a model the singing they had heard that night—so distinct, so devout, so sweet, so expressive, and so uplifting—they would do a very great deal to help to fill some of their empty churches.' Perfectly true!

DVORÁK'S STABAT MATER IN AN ENGLISH VERSION.

The 'Stabat Mater' of Dvorák has justly found so much acceptance that its limitations in regard to performances in churches have now been removed. We refer to the publication, by Messrs. Novello, of the work with English words. These have been adapted by Mr. F. J. W. Crowe, organist of Chichester Cathedral, who, in a prefatory note to this new edition, says:

This English version of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' brings the beauties of the work within the reach of those who, for various reasons, prefer not to use the original Latin. The adaptation avoids the use of any passages of a controversial nature, thus making it available for use in any English place of worship; and, whilst preserving as far as possible the original rhythm, no pains have been spared in making this English version both vocal and practical.

Advantage has been taken of the necessary re-setting (in type) of the work to re-cast the accompaniment specially for performance on the organ. This has been done by Mr. H. Elliot Button, who, within the possibilities afforded by two staves, has provided an accompaniment which (to quote from the preface), 'though not professing to be purely an organ arrangement . . . will, it is hoped, be found useful at the organ, and at the same time easily playable on the pianoforte at rehearsals.' A valuable feature in the arrangement is the clear indication throughout where the pedal should be used, and—which is perhaps of more importance—where it should not be used. This English version of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater'—entitled 'At the foot of the Cross'—will not supersede the original edition with Latin words, which is still to be had; but it may help to make better known one of the most inspired works of the gifted Bohemian composer, CHICHESTER CATHEDRAL.

The organ—originally built by Renuart Harris in 1677, in this southern sanctuary—has recently been renovated by Messrs. Hele and Co. A special service in connection with the re-opening of the instrument took place on September 28, when the Cathedral choirs of Salisbury, Winchester, and Chichester, accompanied by their respective organists (Messrs. W. Prendergast, South, and Crowe), united their forces in exultant song. Four anthems were sung: 'Hosanna' (Gibbons), 'I will love thee' (Jeremiah Clark), 'The heavens declare' (Boyce), and 'It came even to pass' (Ouseley). At the conclusion of the prayers Croft's Te Deum in A was rendered, and Mr. Crowe played Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata.

On the following afternoon—September 29—the newly-formed Cathedral Oratorio Society successfully performed the 'Hymn of Praise' as the chief feature of the Harvest Festival, this being the seventh oratorio service promoted and conducted by Mr. F. J. W. Crowe since he became organist of the Cathedral two and a-half years ago. Everything went well, and all who participated are to be congratulated upon efforts so artistically and conscientiously put forth with results so good and that are so highly appreciated.

A correspondent writes in reference to the tune 'Hollingside':

In your interesting article in the October issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES you give some particulars of the late Dr. J. B. Dykes and his tune 'Hollingside.' If he took the name of the tune from the cottage, the cottage took its name from the beautiful wood adjoining, which perhaps ought to be considered the source of both. You mention his organ-playing at St. Oswald's Church, Durham. He also took the service at Durham Cathedral in Dr. Henshaw's time, and I well remember his excellent phrasing of the accompaniment to 'O thou that tellest.'

One of the most interesting chapters in Herr Kalbeck's volume is that devoted to Brahms's life and work at the little princely Court of Detmold, where the young master had to conduct a choir of female voices and give pianoforte lessons to Serene Highnesses and other ladies of the Court. His various works for ladies' voices (trios with horn and harp accompaniment, Marienlieder, &c.) are the outcome of this early experience. His two orchestral serenades were also composed at Detmold.

To the historian of music our author's accounts of the genesis of some of the master's works are of the greatest value; e.g., we learn that the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor caused Brahms greater labour than anything else he ever produced. It was at first intended for a Symphony; when he felt himself incompetent to grapple successfully with the orchestra throughout four movements, especially in what he intended to be a triumphant, apotheosis-like Finale—he thought of turning the work into a sonata for two pianofortes, only to change his mind once more and publish it as a concerto in three movements. There was originally a fourth movement, viz., a Funeral March, which was ultimately incorporated in the German Requiem, where it stands as one of the greatest monuments to the master's genius. It is the famous second movement, in B flat minor, 'Behold all flesh is as the grass.' When we learn that the Pianoforte Concerto, as originally conceived, was the direct outcome of the overwhelming impression which the Schumann tragedy had made upon young Brahms, we begin to realize the meaning of its titanic first movement, of the solace-breathing sweetness of the Adagio, and the raison d'être of the (cancelled) Funeral March. How the work failed utterly to appeal to the Leipzig Gewandhaus audience, and was received with hisses; how the Press condemned it unmercifully; and how young Brahms received the chastisement with the stoic calm and unaffected modesty of a true philosopher, are most interesting incidents in his career.

Another masterpiece which gave him great trouble was the Pianoforte Quartet in C minor (Op. 60), which was begun during his Düsseldorf days (1854-56), but withheld from publication till the year 1875. The first movement, originally in C sharp minor and one of the gloomiest that he ever wrote, tells a tale of disappointment and despair. Brahms himself explained, when he was about to play it to Herr Deiters, 'Now you must imagine a man who is on the point of shooting himself, because nothing else remains for him to do!' What a new light this remark throws upon the powerful music, especially the beautiful pleading second subject! And how the wonderful slow movement, with its long-drawn chief subject—perhaps the most impressive cantabile passage that Brahms ever wrote—seems to sing to us:

with even greater fervour and to shine with a brighter radiance than before!

The first movement of the superb C minor Symphony (No. 1) also dates from an early period of Brahms's creative activity. Herr Kalbeck considers that the powerful effect which Schumann's 'Manfred' music (especially the Overture) had upon the younger musician found expression in the gloomy music of that remarkable first movement, 'the vigour and passion and poetry of which,' to quote the late Sir George Grove, 'are worthy of any master—especially of any master writing his first Symphony.' The two pieces certainly show a great similarity of mood, and, as Herr Kalbeck points out, even the thematic material bears some resemblance, as a comparison of these two ideas shows:—

The first movement seems to have been commenced shortly after Schumann's death in 1856, though doubtless it was often overhauled before it assumed its present shape, and was produced at Carlsruhe on November 4, 1876.

Herr Kalbeck's 'descriptions' of the two great Pianoforte Quartets in G minor and A (Op. 25 and 26) are especially interesting, as they touch upon a matter to which he frequently refers throughout his book, viz.: Brahms's fondness for quoting himself and other masters. These quotations are generally so cleverly disguised by the ingenious master that they are not likely to strike the casual listener. When we are given chapter and verse for them they become, however, distinctly fascinating. Brahms's own view on 'reminiscences' is given in a letter addressed to Dessoff, who had dedicated a string quartet to him, and afterwards remembered that a certain passage bore a strong resemblance to a passage in his friend's second Symphony. Brahms replied: 'Let me beg of you not to do anything foolish. One of the stupidest chapters on stupid people is that about "reminiscences." The little passage in question is nothing in my work, really nothing at all, however excellent the rest may be. Yours, on the other hand, is charmingly invented, warm, beautiful and natural. Don't spoil it, don't touch it; you cannot often express yourself so beautifully.'

Finally, this biography is one more recital of the hard fight for recognition which genius has to face. Brahms can never have been considered a revolutionist, and yet the story of his early life, as told with hitherto unobtainable amplitude in this excellent work, differs but very slightly from the tales of the world's callous indifference to some of his great predecessors and contemporaries. It is the old tragedy of the distrust, stupidity, and malice of the many who ignore and deny, and of the sweet recompense found in the devotion of the few who love, and, loving, understand.

Morning and Evening Service in D. E. H. Thorne.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. A. Herbert Brewer. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. E. H. Thorne has so long proved himself to be a Church musician of the first rank that one takes up his Service in D with pleasurable anticipation, and this is realized upon perusal of the score. The Service includes that of the Office for the Holy Communion, and the music demands a fairly large and thoroughly well-trained choir; but the composer writes only that which is vocally effective. The setting of the Te Deum is conceived in a jubilant vein, triple measure prevailing; but due dignity is by no means absent, and the close in solid chords (in semi-breves), sung pianissimo, is most impressive. Certain portions of the Benedictus will require precise and alert attack, but the part-writing will interest capable singers. The Credo is allied to music that may be described as brilliant, and on it the composer has manifestly lavished much loving care. There is a touch of the dramatic in the music to the Gloria in Excelsis, and the conclusion is imposing. The setting of the Magnificat is lighter in style, but it contains many effective passages in imitation, and the conclusion is arrived at by a fine climax. The music to the Nunc dimittis is flowing and graceful in character, and the parts are interwoven in a manner distinctly attractive.

The setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Mr. A. Herbert Brewer was sung at the Cathedral service on the last day of the recent Gloucester Festival. The opportunity of examining the music certainly justifies the distinction it then received. The setting is however neither elaborate nor difficult, and may unhesitatingly be recommended to choirs of average abilities. Tender and devotional are the strains allied to the Song of Simeon until the climax is reached at the words 'To be a light,' from which point the music becomes increasingly majestic as it proceeds to the final Amen.

AN ECHO OF THE RECENT MUSIC LOAN EXHIBITION.

It fell to my lot to be in daily attendance during the three weeks that the Music Loan Exhibition of the Worshipful Company of Musicians was open at the Fishmongers' Hall last summer. Many incidents which occurred during that busy time I have forgotten, but there were some that are likely to remain in recollection for a long time yet. The one I am going to recount had almost faded from memory, dispersed perhaps by the incessant work in connection with the eighteen Lectures given, for which I was in a measure responsible. Perhaps it is of sufficient interest to relate to the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES, many of whom must have visited and derived pleasure from the splendid exhibits we were able to collect and arrange for the inspection and gratification of the musical public.

One afternoon the commissioner who had charge of the keyed instrument room came to the office and said a lady and little girl wished to see me. Such calls from persons seeking information about the exhibits were frequent, and, though often at some inconvenience, they had to be attended to, and all possible help afforded. On proceeding to the room I found a lady and a little girl with flaxen hair, blue eyes, and typical English face standing in front of Handel's spinet (No. 1034), looking with eager eyes at the instrument which had belonged to the great master. 'Please will you let me play on Handel's spinet?' asked the child. I pointed to the label 'Do not touch.' 'I cannot let you play on it,' I said, 'for that would be breaking the rules; besides, it is so different from the touch of the pianoforte upon which you play that you would find it hard to get the notes down, and quite difficult to play.' 'But do let me try,' the child pleaded. So I took her to my own spinet in the corner of the room, with which I felt I could do as I liked, and said, 'Try and play on that if you can recollect any music.' To my surprise she played neatly and with little hesitation one of Bach's simple 'Two-part Inventions.' The child seemed to grasp the peculiar touch required, and managed the instrument quite successfully.

After this I could not resist the fresh appeal to let her fingers touch the keys that had been hallowed by Handel. I hope that Miss Edith Hipkins, the owner of the dear old instrument, will forgive me, but being a member of the Executive Committee I felt I possessed a certain dispensing power and consequently accorded permission for the child to play her piece. As there was no chair available she had to stand to play. So well did she play that the little crowd which had gathered round her called out 'Encore!' and at my request she repeated the piece, her face beaming with delight. I then took the child and her aunt round the room, pointing out the beautiful old instruments on view, and briefly explaining the way in which the tone of these different prototypes of the pianoforte was produced by the action of a tangent, plucking jack, or hammer. Our little visitor asked many questions, showing great interest in the old instruments, and left after expressions of delight at what she had seen and with warm thanks for my having allowed her to play on Handel's instrument.

I had almost forgotten the episode, but the other day I received the following letter, bearing the Jamaica post-mark, which recalled the pleasant incident. It is written in a childish hand on paper having lines ruled in pencil:

DEAR MR. SOUTHGATE,

Thank you so much for letting me have the honour of playing on Handel's Spinet. While I was playing I could only think how nice it was to play on such a great man's Spinet, and would you kindly let me know if that was the old tin kettlely Spinet that Handel had in his Garret room?

Two years ago I was ill for a whole year. Auntie bought me a song book when I was a little better and able to walk. Auntie read me the poetry of Handel. I was six years old then and I used to wish to be able to play like him, but I could only play by ear then.

Mother commenced teaching me last July, and I passed the 1st Preparatory of the I. S. M. in December.

I am, your grateful little friend,

NENA MACPHERSON.

No doubt Nena had heard the well-known tale of Handel as a boy secretly practising on an old clavichord in a loft of his father's house. I must now tell my little friend that the instrument on which she played was not 'the kettlely Spinet' of the story, but a perfect example of the fine instruments made by Hitchcock, a 17th-century English maker whose good work still endures.

Nena has entered on the right path; she has obtained a Certificate, which I am sure was not given without being well deserved. One hopes that the recollection of our Music Loan Exhibition will be a pleasant memory to her for life.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

The importance of the provincial Festivals is realized by comparatively few Londoners, yet these great meetings of chorally-sung provide the vivifying element of musical progress in England. The present appreciation of orchestral music is a good thing, for it brings into prominence the intellectual force in music; but Englishmen are singing men, and it is in vocal music that our composers have achieved their greatest triumphs. Their works have been inspired by the encouragement extended by the provincial Festivals, and the increasing number of these meetings is to be hailed with satisfaction. Their relative importance rests upon the enthusiasm of the choristers, and hence it is that the Yorkshire and Midland gatherings hold the first place. There now abide Leeds, Birmingham, and Sheffield: and the greatest of these—who shall say?

This year it has been the turn of the first named to maintain the prestige of these mighty meetings, and right well has it met its responsibilities. Greater resonance and robustness of tone has been heard from the basses at a time before the order went forth that only men of Leeds should sing in the choir; but the tenor voices were a delight to listen to, and the tone of the contraltos and sopranos was all that could be desired. It cannot be said that in expression the choral singing was electrifying; speaking generally, subtleties of verbal accentuation, and the diversity of tone-colour which arises from individual and collective intensity of feeling, were very rarely heard, but yet a very high standard was attained and maintained. The attack was unflinching, crescendi and diminuendi were finely graduated, and alertness, intelligence, and earnestness were always manifest. It was choral singing of which Englishmen have a right to be proud, and Mr. H. A. Fricker, the chorus-master, is to be warmly congratulated upon the success of his efforts.

The band was perhaps the finest ever heard in Leeds, and this is saying much. It is questionable, however, if so large a force as 123 players was really required. Occupying the entire centre of the orchestra, the instrumentalists divided the choir by a dangerously wide space, with the result that many of the choristers were relegated into far corners. In the purely instrumental works, when under Sir Charles Stanford's direction, the band produced a superb volume of tone; when required they roared as lions, at other times, in the softest pianissimi, they cooed like doves, but in nearly all the modern choral works the orchestra frequently overpowered the choir, and still more the soloists. When such an instrumental giant is on the platform, would it not be well to revert to the ripieno orchestra common in the days of Handel? Can eighty-two strings ever be necessary to accompany a single voice?

The first of the seven novelties included in the Festival programme was furnished by Sir Alexander Mackenzie—a Cantata entitled 'The Witch's Daughter,' for soprano and baritone soloists, chorus, and orchestra, produced on the evening of the first day of the Festival (October 5). Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES were made acquainted with the design and scope of this work in last month's issue, and those who did not attend the Festival may have an opportunity of gaining further knowledge of the work on January 26 next, when it is to be performed by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall. Under these circumstances it is only necessary to point out some salient points and record some impressions. The opening chorus is appropriately gay, and the bustle and the merriment of the harvest home is admirably suggested by the rhythmic strains. With the baritone's sympathetic solo—telling of the witch's daughter's isolation—the chorus becomes subdued, and the tragic note acquires its greatest intensity in Mabel's prayer 'Dear God and Father of us all.' On this the composer has manifestly lavished loving care, and every page attests to the hand of the master craftsman. The manliness of Harden's protest—

Good neighbours mine !
This passes harmless mirth ;
I brook no insult to my guest, finds an echo in the music; and the subsequent titterings of the villagers, gradually broadening into satirical laughter, are most realistically illustrated. A charming chorus for female voices opens the second scene, and many pathetic touches intensify the despair of Mabel. When a lover takes twenty-five lines to propose, and a lady fifteen to say 'Yes,' it is difficult for a composer to sound the dramatic note; the most he can do is to be sympathetic; this Sir Alexander has been successful in accomplishing, particularly with the somewhat slowly realized joy of the lovers, which leads up to a beautiful and most effective chorus, concluding this episode. The most memorable feature of the third scene is the setting of the 'Corn Song' for baritone solo and chorus, which probably will find an existence independent of the entire composition. Musically, one of the finest portions of the cantata is the epilogue, a masterly built up number which brings the work to an imposing termination. Sir Alexander had good reason to be satisfied with the performance, especially with the choir, who sang admirably. The soloists were Madame Sobrino and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies.

The most serious, and the most memorable production—one which gave the Festival its greatest distinction—was a setting to music by Dr. Walford Davies of the morality play 'Everyman,' produced on the second evening of the Festival (October 6). As this work was also outlined in last month's MUSICAL TIMES, a detailed description of its characteristics is unnecessary, but so remarkable and noble a work cannot be passed over without generous acknowledgment in these columns of its importance. Before doing so, however, a hope may be expressed that 'Everyman' will not induce other young composers to seek inspiration in death and its mysteries. The gradations of dissolution between soul and body set forth with the detail of 'Death and Transfiguration,' 'The Dream of Gerontius,' and 'Everyman,' are saved from morbidity by the power and genius of their respective composers; but one shudders to think of the treatment of such subjects by composers of less distinctive gifts.

The key-note of Dr. Davies's music is its unpretentious truth, and in this, combined with a keen sense of the necessity for contrast, lies the strength of the work. Those who remember the composer's oratorio 'The Temple' (produced at the Worcester Festival of 1902) will know the sincerity of his aims, but it is possible to be earnest without being appropriate. In 'Everyman,' however, it is the appropriateness of the music that invests it with peculiar interest and impressiveness. As one listens to its strains one becomes oblivious to the fact that they are essentially modern in construction and harmony. The accusation against man by the Deity—one of the most solemn numbers of the score—is almost entirely built up with dominant sevenths. No sense of incongruity however arises, but rather a deepening of the majestic sorrow underlying the words 'I perceive here in My Majesty how My creatures be to Me unkind.' From the passionless reiteration of Death's horn, which opens the work, to its solemn massive closing chords, the music is permeated with the spirit of the venerable morality play, which has manifestly appealed to the gifted composer with a force that has enabled him to express in sound the convictions of his soul. The performance probably did not fully realize the composer's intentions. Very intimate knowledge of the music is necessary to express all its subtleties, but the interpretation at Leeds will not be easy to surpass. It was obvious that it had won the hearts of the chorists. The pianissimi passages were exquisitely sung, and when a crescendo rising to a fortissimo was required it came with the irresistible force of a majestic tidal wave. The rôle of Everyman, chiefly written for a bass voice, was sung with remarkable power by Mr. H. Lane-Wilson. It was an embodiment that places him in the front rank of artists. Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Muriel Foster, and Mr. John Coates completed a quartet that contributed in great measure to the enthusiastic reception of the work. The ovation Dr. Davies received when he laid down the bâton was a genuine expression of appreciation.

'Everyman' was succeeded by Mr. Josef Holbrooke's new poem for orchestra and chorus entitled 'Queen Mab.' Hitherto there has been something lacking in the most important works by this talented composer—a something that has detracted from their artistic value, but this is not observable in the Leeds composition. Doubtless Mr. Holbrooke could have obtained the effects he desired without writing for eight horns, a xylophone, &c.; but the design is clear, and Mercutio's relation of Queen Mab's pranks in Dreamland is illustrated orchestrally with consistency, and in a manner that holds the attention of the listener. The section dealing with the fairy's influence on lovers' dreams opens with a beautiful theme, which is afterwards taken up by the choir, who deliver part of Romeo's speech to Juliet at her window—'Arise, fair sun, and kill the envious moon.' Mr. Holbrooke is also to be commended for writing gratefully for the voices, and the result is a charming chorus.

With the penultimate evening (October 7) came a trio of novelties, the first of which was the 'Ballad of Dundee,' by Dr. Charles Wood. This is a setting for bass solo, chorus and orchestra of Professor Aytoun's martial lines relating to the death of Claverhouse. The first chorus, cast in the form of a slow march, is impressive; after this, however, the composer seems to have failed to perceive the heroic spirit of the lines. Claverhouse's address to his troopers on the eve of the battle is depressing instead of being inspiring, and as rendered by Mr. Plunket Greene, under the direction of the composer, was calculated to make any troops turn homewards. The choruses are written however in a plain, straightforward manner, and the choir seemed to take pleasure in singing them.

Sir Charles Stanford's Violin Concerto in D (Op. 74)—written in the autumn of 1899—had been once previously played in public at Bournemouth. It cannot therefore be regarded as expressing the composer's present convictions in this form, but it is a refined and pleasing work. The first movement lacks character, but is made memorable by a phrase which, given out pizzicato by the strings at the opening, constantly recurs in the development. The second number, headed 'Canzona,' possesses sympathetic charm of a plaintive kind, and the Finale, in Rondo form, has for its principal subject a 'Gaelic air' instinct with lightheartedness. This is treated in a spirited manner, and causes the work to leave an enlivening impression. Herr Fritz Kreisler played the solo part with his usual refinement and brilliancy, and at the close composer and executant received hearty and prolonged applause.

Still greater warmth of appreciation followed the singing by Mr. Plunket Greene of Sir Charles Stanford's new 'Five Songs of the Sea.' These are delightful examples of the Irish composer's genius. The poems by Mr. Henry Newbolt are severally named 'Drake's Drum,' 'Outward bound,' 'Devon, O Devon, in wind and rain,' 'Homeward bound,' and 'The Old "Superb,"' and the music by reason of its melodic form and by simple but effective touches reflects and accentuates the sentiment of the words. Each song is furnished with parts for male chorus, and the prompt and artistic manner in which they were taken up by the tenors and basses contributed in no small degree to the pronounced success of the songs, the last of which had to be repeated, so great was the insistence of the audience. The selection of non-novelties sung at the Festival was commendable, with the exception of the programme of the third morning (October 7), which was devoted to Wagner. Excerpts from 'Parsifal' are acceptable because the work can only be heard in England in the concert room, and its lofty theme and character are in accord with the festival spirit; but the conclusion of the third act of 'Lohengrin' and the last act of 'Die Meistersinger' were not effective. Such performances are unsatisfactory to those who have seen the works on the stage, and give erroneous impressions to others. I speak emphatically because there is a manifest increasing tendency to include operatic excerpts at festival gatherings, and for several reasons it is desirable that this should be checked. Under the most favourable conditions it is an inartistic proceeding and calculated to lower esteem for these meetings.

Of the choral works performed, the finest results were obtained in Beethoven's Mass in D (on October 8), in which the choristers seemed to take particular delight. They were greatly assisted by Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. William Green and Mr. Andrew Black, who formed a quartet it would be difficult to surpass. The rendering of Bach's eight-part motet 'Sing to the Lord,' sung unaccompanied, was a triumph for the chorus-master, Mr. H. A. Fricker, who conducted it; and at the same concert Sir Hubert Parry directed a memorable interpretation (on October 6) of his inspiring motet 'Voces Clamantium.' 'That is music which makes one feel stronger' said an appreciative member of the audience as he left the hall, and it was a true criticism.

All the novelties were conducted by their respective composers, but in addition Sir Edward Elgar was induced to direct the performance of his Overture 'In the South' (Op. 50). His appearance was the signal for a tremendous outburst of applause from the choir, which was still greater at the conclusion of the piece. The Overture was magnificently played, and the rough, strident harmonies in the section referring to the Roman power were delivered by the splendid orchestra with irresistible force and thrilling power. The Festival opened (on October 5) with Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' and concluded (on October 8) with Handel's Sixth Chandos Anthem, preceded by Sir Arthur Sullivan's 'Golden Legend.' The last named received a loving interpretation from the choristers, to some of whom the cantata doubtless brought back lively memories of the composer who so loyally and long worked with them and to whose untiring efforts the present satisfactory position of the Leeds Festival is largely due.

In addition to the soloists already mentioned the following vocalists also took part: Miss Marie Brema, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Gervase Elwes, Henry Brearley, Charles Knowles, and Herbert Parker. Mention should also be made of Mrs. James Wilson, Mrs. Fisher Heath, Mrs. H. P. Atkinson, Miss M. Swales, Miss M. Kankine, Miss S. Cover and Messrs T. Middleton, F. W. Taylor, P. James, W. M. Williams and H. Parker—this group of singers being members of the choir who sang the concerted numbers in 'Elijah' with great finish and excellent balance of tone.

In order to complete the record, the following works were performed in addition to those already enumerated: Brahms's Violin Concerto in D major (soloist, Herr Fritz Kreisler) and 'Song of Destiny'; the symphonic poem 'Tod und Verklärung' (Richard Strauss). Symphonies: Beethoven's in B flat; Glazounow's in C minor, and Mozart's in E flat. Overtures 'Euryanthe' (Weber) and 'Lustspiel' (Smetana). Mr. Frye Parker occupied the post of first violin, and Mr. H. A. Fricker (city organist and Festival chorus-master) and Mr. H. H. Pickard were at the organ. The courtesy of Mr. Fred R. Spark, the veteran Secretary of the Festival, and his staff of stewards also calls for full recognition and acknowledgment.

Competition Festivals.

BLACKPOOL.

Blackpool held its fourth annual Musical Festival on the 6th, 7th and 8th October. The event now ranks as one of the most important of its kind held in the North of England. The town affords unusual facilities for gatherings of this kind. In the Winter Gardens there is ample accommodation under cover for the distribution and comfort for many thousands of persons. As the Festival is courageously and liberally managed by many of the best business heads in the town, and is looked upon by the residents generally as an enterprise likely to extend the popularity of the place, it will be seen that there are many elements in the scheme that explain the gratifying success it has so far secured. But the most heaven-sent arrangements would be vain if there were no material to work upon, no spirits to summon from the vasty deep—if Lancashire and Yorkshire may be so described. Fortunately, musical organizations of all kinds abound in those two counties, and the Blackpool Committee has tried to earn their confidence. The programme comprised about seventy pieces, all good and by the best old and modern composers. About 120 soloists competed on the first day. The second day was devoted to the children, who drew large and delighted audiences. One of the items was the cantata 'Vogelweid' (Rathbone), which was admirably performed under Mr. H. Whittaker. On the third day choirs and bands came from all parts of the North. Ten mixed-voice choirs competed in the chief section, the first-prize in which was a silver challenge shield and twenty guineas. There were also second, third, and fourth prizes. The tests in this class were as follows:

'O that the learned poets'	Gibbons
'Love and Beauty'	W. H. Bell
'I can but love thee'	Cornelius
'The Challenge of Thor'	Elgar

Cornelius's piece was a very hard nut to crack. It is probably one of the most difficult part-songs ever written. But it was sung correctly and expressively by several of the choirs. Morecambe, under Mr. Arthur Davies, came first. The Harrogate Vocal Union, under Mr. Ball, came next, and Padiham, under Mr. Hilston, and Southport, under Mr. Tattersall, respectively third and fourth. In the male-voice choir class, Southport, under Mr. Clarke, gained the victory, Manchester Orpheus, under Mr. Nesbitt, coming very close behind, and Harrogate, under Mr. Ball, third. The tests were:

'Weep, silly soul'	Benet
'Yea, cast me from heights of the mountains'	Elgar
'Creation's Hymn' (arranged)	Beethoven
'Marching along'	Bantock

Three full orchestras competed in the orchestral class; the test-piece was the overture to 'Der Freischütz.' Colne, under Mr. Wildman, gave a very fine performance and gained the first prize of £30. In the string orchestra class, the test in which was Grieg's 'Holberg' Suite, Nelson, under Mr. Townsley, was first. All the orchestras were remarkably good. At the final gathering the audience numbered many thousands, and there was much enthusiasm. An interesting incident was the singing of a young girl, Miss Clara Butterworth, who gained the junior solo-singing prize last year. Miss Butterworth has just been awarded the Ada Lewis Singing Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music. Canon Gorton, of Morecambe, gave away the prizes. The adjudicators, during part of the time, were Dr. Sinclair, Mr. R. H. Wilson, Mr. C. H. Fogg, and Mr. Percy Pitt. Dr. McNaught adjudicated all through.

A word of grateful acknowledgment is due to the compiler or compilers of the programme which, besides being handsomely got up, contained much interesting historical and critical literary matter. The words of all the vocal music were included in this substantial book of forty-six pages. It only remains to heartily congratulate the Officers and Committee upon the substantial results of their honorary labours.

NOTTINGHAM.

The third annual competitive musical Festival was held in the Mechanics' Hall on October 21 and 22. The classes for juniors brought forward some first-rate ability. It is evident that the teachers of all four of the school choirs that competed were skilful trainers of children's voices. This ability was particularly manifested in the performance of the Radford School Choir, under Mr. William Woolley. This choir was awarded the Challenge Cup, which they have now gained for the second time. The choirs united to perform the cantata 'The Frogs and the Ox' (Bridge). The adult choral competitions were well supported: eleven choirs sang in three classes. In the chief class four highly-trained choirs sang Elgar's 'Weary Wind of the West' and Eaton Faning's 'The Fortune-Teller's Song.' The Coventry Co-operative Festival Choir, under Mr. Petty, gave admirable performances of both pieces, and were awarded for the second time the Challenge Shield offered as a first-prize. Mr. Woolley's choir were only a shade inferior. A choir from Kirkby-in-Ashfield, under Mr. W. B. Harris Barke, gained a first position in another class. A programme of choruses and part-songs was given by the united choirs, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles E. Riley. Mr. F. Wyatt was the official accompanist. Dr. McNaught adjudicated. The audiences were large, and at the evening competition on the second day they followed the proceedings with great interest. The Mayor presented the prizes.

THE THOMAS CHURCH, LEIPZIG, FROM THE NORTH-WEST : WITH THE OLD THOMAS SCHOOL, SINCE DEMOLISHED.

BACH FESTIVAL IMPRESSIONS.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Leipzig, October 4.

A carnival of moving basses. A discredited pianoforte. The joyous penetrative trumpet. The earnest faces of wholly skilled men. A perfect concert-hall. A church whose every corner seems to resound sympathetic to music specially created and born to fill it. An inimitable violoncello performance. A rich self-reliant tenor voice. The absolute triumph of those who treat old music as still flesh and blood, and the conviction that their opponents can stand no more than chaff will lie against the wind. An intercourse with some strong personalities. The vigour of German debate. A tour through old Leipzig, and a sense that it is better than new magnificent Leipzig. Some peaceful lazy moments in the Rosenthal. The recognition of these shrewd Alt-Sachsen as our veritable cousins. The thought of the chasm in music, if some great Saxons, as Handel, Bach and Schumann, had been out of it. The overwhelming recognition forced on one, sitting in Bach's own church, of the infinite genius of this man, who united the cold judgment of the intellect, the fairy visions of the imagination, the warm pleadings of the heart, and the submission of religion. The recognition that in our megalopolitan, cosmopolitan London, we can do much, but cannot rival the best indigenous manifestations; Bayreuth is still Wagner, Ober-Ammergau is still the Passion-Play, the Dauphiné is still Berlioz, and Leipzig is still Bach. To those who doubt, one can say with Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia, 'come and see.' These are the most vivid impressions of the last few days. Inclination says, dally with them; duty says, proceed to a straightforward report.

Those moving basses are the gist of the matter. These are what tramped their march eternally through Bach's brain, and even to those of the less gifted of his age. We had them once ourselves in England in the music of our viol-writers. Homophony has since gone on absorbing the realm of true polyphony. It has been the parent and just vehicle of sentiment. And the new polyphonic systems of the later Beethoven, of Schumann, of Wagner, of Brahms, of Richard Strauss, &c., have known how to hold it correctly brigaded with its predecessor. But for the mass of the musical world it has been the occasion for insipidity and degeneration. Here is where the lesson of a Bach Festival comes in. There are reams of modern music, where the double-bass player stands listless by his instrument, plucking a casual occasional string with easy forefinger; one may be sure then that homophony is paramount, and, if it be not very rhythmic music, at its worst; and compare that with these tireless men of the iron left-hand, who go on stopping multitudinous intervals for an hour at a stretch, and so making a bass which has the vitality of quicksilver. It may be said that this soon makes a surfeit. As a matter of fact, such is the power of motion, that it does not. 'Come and see.' There is also a class of composer, those of the stagnant imagination, who in spite of a brave show of pseudo-polyphony, and while supposing that they are doing great things, are in reality only setting down just a harmony to a bar with the monotony of a first harmony-exercise. There cannot be imagined a better thoroughly-cathartic lesson for minor and younger composers, especially those who despise counterpoint studies, than a dose of Bach such as this freely administered. The melampode might give them a revelation, and new ideas how to walk truly in the steps of the great moderns.

Then about Bach's power of colour-variegation, though this is perhaps more for distant wonder than modern application. It was most noticeable in the four Church Cantatas yesterday evening. His palette contains voices high and voices low, accompanied and unaccompanied, solo and chorus, orchestra, organ, cembalo, solo violin, solo violoncello, solo hautboy, and last and possibly best the marvellous trumpet. A sectional interchange of these elements, when conjoined with architectonic structures of immense breadth and tonal clearness, gives ample relief to the ear, and indeed steeps the most hardened sense in a bath of delight. The trumpet, introduced with such skill as to seem like an agile flute, and with entrancing small counterpoints, sailed through and above everything in the lofty Gothic arches, a supernal voice discreet yet dominating. Alone did the hammers of the pianoforte strike a jarring tone, not so much in pure recitative as when mixed with strings; but then Bach thought of no hammers and only the plucking jacks.

Then as to the style of execution. There are two camps here in Germany. And I may take the privilege of a correspondent to declare at once to which side I myself attorn, and have for forty years. I am unable to see why in playing old music one should be as melancholy as an indig-dyer. The old writers had just as much heart as we have, perhaps more. That Bach played his works, or had them played, without commas and semicolons; that he refused an effect of contrast, when he could get it; that he played a dead-level mezzoforte; that he prevented a voice from expressive utterance; that he used no dynamic marks except what he showed in his scores; all this is inconceivable. Nay further it is plain that men of that day, being human beings like ourselves, would have rejoiced just as much as we do, if their fingers had found their way to the velvet beauties of a Broadwood and the sonorities of a Bechstein, or if their ears had taken in the richness of a Böhm and Sax orchestra. What they would have then done with their own scores cannot be said, but they certainly would have been the readiest to make accommodative and elastic alterations, large or small, therein. The only true, sound rule can be to play old music now so as to make it thoroughly effective according to the judgment of the best-informed, and instinctively most gifted, musicians of the existing day. And of these two things the gift is vastly superior to the information. About the details of such a decision, certainly one must be prepared for endless strife. An antiquarian bias or bent on some point or other, or the circumstances of a particular class of performances, may pull one way; and over-impulsiveness may pull the other way. But this much is certain, that the policy of playing old music under the old conditions simply because they are the old conditions, is a dead thing. Those who are content with such an abracadabra are in danger of being classed with the self-satisfied ones of the Halls of Circe. And of the performances resulting in such cases, nine-tenths of them are exhibitions of the supremest dulness, listened to from terror of a great name or a prevailing fashion, and accompanied with absolutely hypocritical assertions of enjoyment. Oh, the cant of the sheep of Panurge! However, to return to Leipzig. No extremes mark here a difference of opinion which lies rather in a nutshell. Neither does one side advocate ancientness for mere ancientness' sake, nor has the other side attempted the least modification of Bach's scores. The sole question seems to be whether Bach was a rather monotonous person, or one who gave to his music all the feeling, and indeed passion, of which it was capable. More concretely, whether a Berlin tradition of the last fifty years is the end of all things, or whether some younger spirits in the Neue Bachgesellschaft may be permitted, as they reverently hope, to improve thereon. I did not myself detect the defects alleged to the direction. I thought the organ-playing perfect, and the concert-conducting spirited and withal judicious; and I freely confess that the Church Cantatas performed separately in the Thomas-Kirche constituted the most beautiful experience of the whole of my life.

Dismissing these matters, which savour rather of the molecular, I would urge that a Bach Festival of several days here in the heart of earnest Lutheran Saxony, among people saturated with the Bach tradition, and partly in Bach's own church, gives the only true presentment of the composer. Details may be equalled or bettered elsewhere. The Thomaner boys are certainly not as the boys of a Magdalen College. The unaccompanied Motets will be better sung as a vocal exhibition on a large scale by the healthy voices of a Yorkshire choir. But for the whole, for an atmosphere, for a general spirit, for artists specially trained to this work, one must go to the fountain-head. The works of every composer without exception who speaks in a new language must pass through a stage when the reproducing executive artists not only execute it uncertainly but make it cacophonous. These ears have heard Bach and Brahms sound downright hideous, and by no means in lowly places. The reason is that, as the Greeks unhampered with a stave notation freely confessed, all music is 'chroa' or shading. When the harmony-books, and the notations, and the most skilful composers' pens have all done their work, the performers make concerted music just by leaning together, and forming sounds nowhere nowise recognised. Till their instincts are trained that they successfully lean together, the music is not smooth, and, if it is out-of-the-way music, may be hideous. This is the real meaning of going to the fountain-head, much more than slaking sentiment by the inspection of localities or the conjuring up of associations. And the art-world is now all for impeccability. Again then with Aemilius Paullus, 'Come and see.' Our money can buy most things, but, vigorously progressing as we are, it cannot yet buy all this local Saxon instinctive Bach skill.

The report seems in danger of not being written at all. Bach died on July 28, 1750, and on July 28, 1850, the German 'Bach Society' began formal existence. It undertook to print and publish in full score the entire works of Bach, till then almost exclusively in manuscript and ignored. For the facts of the 100 years of gross neglect and subsequent fifty years of publishing activity, see the concluding historical volume. The subscribers to the Bach Society had the satisfaction of making the greatest reparation of injustice ever made within the domain of art; and it was a reparation to one whom Beethoven called 'the forefather and immortal god of harmony.' The leading spirit of the Bach Society's last twelve years was Hermann Kretzschmar; who in turn, when all was published, inaugurated on January 27, 1900, the 'New Bach Society,' with a new set of subscribers, to bring out lesser editions, and divert the instauration into this and that practical channel. On March 21-23, 1901, was held at Berlin a First Bach Festival. Now they have held a Second Bach Festival at Leipzig on October 1-3, 1904. The whole programmes will not be detailed. They can be found entire in the International Musical Society's Journal for August, 1904 (page 461). The Saturday noon or just-after-noon 'Motet' service in the Thomas-Kirche, with which the Festival opened, has been practically continuous since 1358, when in deprecation of a great pestilence there was ordained a Mass to the Virgin 'singulis Sabbathis perpetue'; but actual and large motets therat began only a hundred years ago. Bach motets were then being sung before Sunday service by an amateur choir, and about 1810 Cantor J. G. Schicht shifted them to the Saturday afternoon service. The motets are unaccompanied. The Thomasschule, founded on December 2, 1409, is exactly on the footing of Magdalen College School, and the foundationers are the Thomaner choristers; so in France a maîtrise. The accompanying illustration shows the old school, between the church and 'Promenade,' pulled down a few years back. The church itself, from about 1200 the chapel of the Augustinian canons of St. Thomas, was built in its present form 1482-96, renewed by Lipsius 1877-89. It has a vaulted roof of immense height; style, highly ornamented German Gothic; west-end spacious organ and choir gallery, where all the music is made. The church bought its first organ in 1525 from the Liebfrauen-Kirche (St. Mary's Church) at Eich, renovated in 1610, and this was Bach's organ; in 1772 replaced by a 'Schweinefleisch,' and that again in 1889 by a 'Wilhelm Sauer' (Frankfort). The organ-tones (voluntaries and accompaniments) are of surpassing grandeur and mellowness. Except the two motets ('Singet dem Herrn' and 'Der Geist hilft unsrer Schwachheit auf') under the usual direction of Cantor Gustav Schreck, the whole Festival was conducted by Karl Straube, Organist of St. Thomas; as above indicated with convincing warmth and effectiveness. Joachim's participation lent a solid dignity to the proceedings. The tenor of the Festival was Emil Pinks; a glorious voice with perfect intonation, and wherever he came in there was a sense of entire security in the music. Alfred Reisenauer (Leipzig) was chief pianist. Solo violoncello, Julius Klengel. Petzold unerring as trumpet. Chorus, the Leipzig Bachverein. Orchestra, Gewandhaus.

A few words on special items. Julius Klengel's tour de force, Bach's No. 5 Suite in C minor for violoncello solo, was wholly astonishing. Those dreary violin solos (a twelfth higher), with the performer struggling with four-part chords which exasperatingly upset the rhythm at every other bar, are known to patient concert-goers, and it is a pity they ever leave the class-room. Here there was no such sense, and perhaps Klengel also had a rather flat bridge. He gave twenty minutes of this without a flaw of intonation, and one would not have wished it a minute shorter. The 'Contest between Phœbus and Pan,' and the 'Coffee Cantata,' went with delightful briskness. The Bach cantata introduced into Sunday Divine Service was 'Gott der Herr ist Sonn und Schild.' The four great Bach cantatas which, in the church, closed the Festival were:—'Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht,' 'Jesus schläft, was soll ich hoffen,' 'Wachet, betet, seid bereit,' 'Erfreuet Euch, ihr Herzen.' The heart which did not go away rejoicing after this last sustained holy jubilation, sounding like the wheel within wheel of the Cherubim, could not be pensive to enjoyment.

The lectures at the General Meeting of the Society were three,—Pastor Greulich (Posen) on 'Bach and the Lutheran Divine Service,' Max Seiffert (Berlin) on 'Practical representations of Bach compositions,' and Alfred Heuss (Leipzig) on 'The treatment of Bach recitative, especially in the Passion-Music.' The first was in favour of introducing Bach compositions into the ordinary Divine Service. It may be carrying coals to Newcastle or owls to Athens to offer any opinion, but there seems a danger of destroying the magnificent impressiveness of the Lutheran liturgy,—a highly developed priest intonation, with congregational chorales and organ voluntaries. Our perhaps inimitable cathedral service grew, and was not devised by any body of men. There is a place for everything, and the necessity for mixture is not apparent. The other two lectures and some personal matters connected with the New Bach Society will be noticed hereafter.

Our waking brains, ever busy, ever pre-occupied, shut us out from the finest sensibilities. Only on extraordinary occasions comes a moment of enforced absolute quiescence, and then may reach us some aura from a distant person. So with music. Sitting here in the Thomas Church, in the twilight which holds the light, one forgets the world; and then the moment comes when the greatness of Bach enters and takes final possession of one. This man's music is neither archaic nor inusitate, but ever-living; for, having sincerity, which is the greatest force in nature, he saw everything sub specie æternitatis.

CHARLES MACLEAN.

London Concerts.

The recent season of Promenade Concerts conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood at Queen's Hall, terminated on October 21 in the presence of an audience that tested the accommodation of the hall to the utmost. If since our last issue the novelties introduced have proved scarcely of sufficient importance to call for detailed criticism, the selection of music and its performance have been excellent, and the large audiences which have assembled almost nightly have testified to how greatly the efforts of Mr. Wood and his coadjutors have been appreciated.

A few recitals call for comment. M. Kubelik may be said to have opened the autumn musical season at Queen's Hall on October 8, and during the following week M. Mark Hambourg gave a pianoforte recital in the same hall. The first of two violin recitals was given at St. James's Hall on October 19 by M. Bronislaw Huberman, who appeared as a prodigy at Prince's Hall in 1894.

A very favourable impression was created by Mr. Felix Swinstead at his first pianoforte recital on October 17 at Bechstein Hall. The young artist was a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where his talents and industry gained for him the Sterndale Bennett and Thalberg Scholarships. His intelligent and assured interpretations of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110) and Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques,' certainly entitle him to an estimable position amongst pianists of to-day.

Criticism concerning the playing of Señor Sarasate would be superfluous; he gave the first of three recitals at Bechstein Hall on October 22, and, assisted by Dr. Otto Neitzel at the pianoforte, charmed a large audience by his refined and brilliant interpretations of familiar violin pieces.

The London Choral Society (conducted by Mr. Arthur Fagge) gave their first concert this season at the Queen's Hall, on October 24, when Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was successfully performed.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, October 10, 1904.

I change the customary headline of my letters this time because of the fact that circumstances compel me to confine myself (with but trifling excursions) to an account of musical doings in the American metropolis. Music in New York is not music in America, though the musical activities of the metropolis come near to outweighing in extent and importance all those of the rest of the country.

The record of promises for the season about to open will not look so imposing to Londoners as it does to us, but it is still impressive enough for mention. Confronting the music patrons of New York are at least one hundred orchestral concerts,—counting the popular entertainments of this sort which will be given at the Opera House and a few theatres on Sunday evenings; chamber-music concerts by three organizations; choral concerts by the New York Oratorio, Brooklyn Oratorio, and Musical Art Societies, the People's Choral Union and other organizations; fifteen grand operas at the Metropolitan Opera House; an undetermined (or at least unspecified) number of performances of Wagner's 'Parsifal,' in German and English; recitals and concerts by visiting virtuosi, like Ysaye, Kreisler, Vecsey, D'Albert, Pachmann, Hofmann, Paderewski and Kubelik; in addition to a host of local performances of all kinds—vocal and instrumental.

A few words touching some of the promises held out in the various departments I have specified. The repertory, that is to say the list of works from which the operas to be performed will be selected, differs from any that New York has seen for years in one significant respect, viz., more than one-half of the operas are Italian. Since there can be no diminution of the Wagnerian list, this means that, exclusive of Wagner, France and Germany are to have a comparatively insignificant show. As a matter of record, it may be said that the quasi-novelties (or respective revivals, as the Germans would say) are 'Gioconda,' 'Lucrezia Borgia,' Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut,' 'Norma,' 'Die Fledermaus,' and 'I Puritani,' besides the ballet 'Die Puppenfee,' 'Parsifal' is to be relied upon to make the success of the company when 'on the road' after the metropolitan season is over. It is to become the Repertoirestück, against which Wagnerians have railed so long, and may be heard this season in Boston, Pittsburg, Chicago, Cincinnati, and San Francisco, as well as New York.

We are promised an extremely interesting orchestral season. The set concerts will be sixteen given by the Philharmonic Society, fifteen by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, six by the Young People's Symphony Society, six by the People's Symphony Society, an undetermined number by the Symphony Orchestra (on Sunday afternoons in Carnegie Hall), and six by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The last-named represents so determined a purpose to make propaganda for the Russian school of composers as to compel attention. Last year the concerts were begun amidst the humble environment of the 'East Side,' inhabited by the city's hundreds of thousands of foreigners—now it is proposed to remove them to the more aristocratic surroundings of Carnegie Hall, and an attempt is making to give them social as well as artistic prestige, the Russian Ambassador at Washington having lent his name to the undertaking. The list of works promised contains works more or less unfamiliar by leading Russian composers. The Philharmonic Society will this year again present foreign conductors as 'guests'—Gustav F. Kogel, of Frankfurt, Edouard Colonne, of Paris, Wasił I. Safonow, of Moscow, Felix Weingartner, of Berlin, Karl Panzner, of Bremen, and Theodore Thomas, of Chicago. As was the case last season, an extra concert outside of the subscription will be arranged for Herr Weingartner, at which he will conduct Berlioz's 'Harold' symphony and Beethoven's No. 9. Mr. Thomas was conductor of the Society for many years before going to Chicago, and his visit will provide a gladsome celebration, as he is completing the fiftieth year of his career as a conductor.

The Forty-seventh Annual Festival of the Worcester County Musical Association took place at Worcester, Massachusetts, in the last week of September. It did not differ in any essentials from its immediate predecessors.

Wallace Goodrich conducted the choral programmes and Franz Kneisel the orchestral and miscellaneous. The choral works performed were Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' and Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalilah.' Creditable results from an artistic point of view were attained at all the concerts, and the exhibition of popular interest was as great as at any meeting in recent years. Concerning the outcome, a professional friend, who has long been an observer of the Worcester Festivals, writes me :

'There will be a Festival next year. With every season there are pessimistic rumours that the Festivals have run their course, but they are now more firmly established than ever. Of course there is a financial deficit this year; but it is small and is cheerfully met by persons who are gratified at the steady artistic improvement in recent years. This has been especially marked since Wallace Goodrich became the chorus-conductor; but while no end of credit is due to him as a drill-master and conductor, he alone is by no means responsible for the improvement of the concerts, as much credit is due to the scheme adopted by the management by which the number of concerts has been reduced and more time allowed for rehearsals. There are now five regular concerts in the Festival, and as much time is consumed in the week's work as when there were seven concerts to prepare and give.'

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, October 15.

For a long time Vienna has felt the general want of a theatre for the people with a stage of moderate size, suitable for works of too modest a character for the great stage of the grand Opera House. Some years ago a few art-loving citizens formed a society with the view of building such a locale, but sufficient support was not forthcoming. Now Herr Walter Simon, director of the 'Kaiser Jubiläums Stadttheater' has taken up the idea. This theatre, built in 1898 in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Emperor's accession to the throne, was originally intended for classical drama, and for good popular plays. It has greatly prospered since its foundation, and the new director has strengthened interest in it by introducing a folk-opera repertoire. For the past two months, alternating with plays, operas have been given with a special company, chorus, and orchestra. The moving spirit of this undertaking is the young and able conductor Alexander von Zemlinsky, who as an earnest, able composer has already made so good a reputation that one of his operas has been performed at the Court Opera. In the new house he has now given Weber's 'Der Freischütz,' Flotow's 'Martha,' and Lortzing's 'Undine.' The prices of admission are low, so as to be within the means of the less wealthy. The manner in which the works are rehearsed in order to obtain a satisfactory ensemble deserves all recognition; 'Undine' created a specially good impression. The principal rôle was taken by Frl. Petko, a young and talented native of this city. The public has hailed with great delight these folk performances, and there seems every prospect, under the direction of Zemlinsky, of lasting success.

At the Court Opera the director Gustav Mahler has had Beethoven's 'Fidelio' rehearsed and re-staged, and with such excellent results that one can only wish that the master's work was in like manner given at all other theatres. The Overture in E, played at the opening, has the advantage over the great 'Leonora' in that it does not overpower the first scenes of the opera, which are of plain, bourgeois character, and provided with orchestral colouring quite in keeping, but allows them without hindrance to produce their light, cheerful effect, and thus set in fuller relief the later tragic portion. Again, the first scenes are not, as hitherto, played in the courtyard, but in a room in Rocco's dwelling-place, forming part of the State prison; this renders the music much more homely, and therefore produces a far better effect. After the Terzet in F the curtain falls and the march is played as an entr'acte; but, immediately after, the stage exhibits the court of the prison, in which the soldiers are receiving the orders of Pizarro. In the second act, after the duet in G between Florestan and Leonora,—in which the highest point of the drama is reached—the curtain is lowered in the customary manner; but the involuntary entr'acte is filled by the 'Leonora' Overture, No. 3, which here has overpowering dramatic meaning, and which, even from a purely musical point of view, forms a noble transition from the G major of the duet to the C major of the Finale. The bright, joyous presentation of the latter acts as a happy deliverance from the sombre scenes which have preceded. The performance of the music under Mahler was extremely fine. This new presentation of an art-work held in such holy veneration has been unfavourably criticised in certain quarters; but anything striking is sure to meet with opposition.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

All of the muses who interest themselves in music leave their shrines in Belfast during our short and fitful summer. Where they go, who knows? Certainly not to the seaside watering-places where nothing loftier than a brass band or a Pierrot troupe breaks the monotony of the 'deep-voiced, neighbouring ocean.' But autumn brings them all back, and our season has fairly commenced with a concert on October 7, by Miss Ernestine MacCormac (violinist), with whom were associated Miss Bertha Bird and Mons. Emile Bosquet, pianist. There was an excellent programme, and the ability of the artists is undoubted, but unfortunately there was a very poor house.

The Philharmonic Society's programme of the season announces only two works for chorus and orchestra—'Elijah' and Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius.' It will be interesting to see how the latter will be interpreted by Dr. Koeller and the forces at his command. They will have the credit of being the first in Ireland to perform the work. The Society's first concert (a miscellaneous one) was given on October 14, and for this Madame Suzanne Adams, Herr Fritz Kreisler, and Mr. Montague Borwell were engaged, with Mr. Hamilton Harty as accompanist. A very high-class selection of music by such artists caused the concert to be one worth recording by a white stone.

The City organ recitals on Saturdays by Dr. Price are very well attended and most interesting, and the celebrated band of the Royal Irish Fusiliers are just about to begin a series of concerts. Altogether our fine Ulster Hall is kept well employed.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The City Choral Society opened their season on October 13 with a performance of 'Elijah.' The principals were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Philip Newbury, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, concerning whose work nothing need be said. There was fine tone in the choral singing, and the whole performance reflected credit on the Society, and on Mr. F. W. Beard, conductor. The Festival Choral Society commenced on October 20 with the 'Faust' of Berlioz. The orchestral work was extremely fine, the Hungarian March creating a furore. The choral singing was superb, every point being realised, while the tone was resonant and pure. The solo parts were well sustained by Madame Carrie Siviter, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Dan Price, and Mr. James Coleman achieved success as Brander. Dr. Sinclair conducted in masterly fashion. On October 8 the musical matinées at the Royal Society of Artists' Exhibition Rooms commenced under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction and will be continued weekly. The Saturday evening concerts at the Town Hall have been of more than average interest. The Philharmonic Temperance Choir, conducted by Mr. A. R. Witts, gave a miscellaneous concert on October 1, when part-songs by Pinsuti and others were performed. Miss Rosa Bird, pupil of Madame Blanche Marchesi, made a successful début. Mr. Tom Child also contributed songs, and Miss Lily Davis gave some violin solos. On October 15 the Choral and Orchestral Association revived J. F. Barnett's 'Paradise and the Peri,' only once heard in Birmingham (1880) since.

its production at the Festival of 1870. A good all-round performance was given, with Miss Amy Kendal, Miss Hilda Kevin, and Messrs. Percy Bates and Arthur Dunn as principals. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted. Mr. T. M. Abbott began on October 22 a series of viola recitals at the Midland Institute, as instructive expositions for the students of the Institute School of Music.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The local societies have now resumed their practices and taken in hand works to be given in the course of the season. The Bristol Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, are engaged upon Berlioz's 'Faust' and Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah.' The North Bristol Choral Society (Mr. J. Bending, conductor), are rehearsing Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' and 'Hymn of Praise.' Under Mr. A. E. Hill, the St. John's Choral Society have been practising Haydn's Mass in B flat (No. 1). The Society of Bristol Gleemen are rehearsing some new part-songs composed by Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. W. J. Kidner being the conductor. Mr. Edward Cook's choir have chosen for practise Dr. Cowen's 'John Gilpin.'

A new choral society for the district of Knowle and Tottondown has been formed, with Mr. J. F. Nash, of Bristol Cathedral, as conductor. At Bedminster a new male-voice choir under Mr. E. T. Morgan, also of Bristol Cathedral, has been constituted. A glee and madrigal Society has been formed at Portishead, with Mr. Morris Edwards as conductor. Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Edward Cook, of Bristol, have commenced rehearsing Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.'

On October 8 a chamber concert was given at the Victoria Rooms, and there was a large attendance. The executants were Miss Mary Lock (pianoforte), Miss Trotman (violin), and Mr. Herbert Walenn (violinello). There were effective performances of Schubert's Trio in B flat (Op. 99), Mozart's Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violin, and Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C (Op. 3) for pianoforte and violinello. Mrs. E. T. Daniell was the vocalist, and Mr. Hubert Hunt (organist of Bristol Cathedral) accompanied her songs.

At a festival service held in St. Thomas's Church on October 9 the first rendering in Bristol was given of the Te Deum composed by Sir Arthur Sullivan on the occasion of the recovery from illness of His Majesty when Prince of Wales. There was an augmented choir of eighty voices, and an efficient orchestra was led by Mr. Ernest Lane, Mr. W. A. Lamb (organist of the church) being at the organ. The soprano solos were sung by Madame Eva Hartshorne. Under the direction of Mr. E. H. Lutton there was an excellent interpretation of the work.

The choir for the Bristol Festival in 1905 held their first rehearsal on October 20, under Mr. George Riseley. 'The Dream of Gerontius' and 'Engedi' were gone through.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Our concert season makes a start to-day (October 15) with a violin recital given by that extremely precocious artist, Master Florizel von Reuter, but musical events will proceed somewhat perfunctorily until the advent of the series of orchestral concerts.

Messrs. Paterson and Sons have now issued their prospectus, and their scheme promises to maintain, both as regards music and performers, the high artistic standard to which we have now become accustomed. British composers will be well represented, and although modern composers bulk largely in the programmes, the great classical writers are not neglected. The names of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven blend happily with those of Elgar, Tschalkovsky, Saint-Saëns, Borodino, and César Franck. Two of the concerts will be choral, and at them important novelties will be produced. The Choral Union is to perform Sir Hubert Parry's 'Voces Clamantium,' and Mr. Moonie's choir César Franck's 'The Beatitudes.' Dr. Cowen will occupy his accustomed post of conductor-in-chief, and in his absence certain concerts will be conducted by Mr. Henschel, M. Colonne, and M. Steinbach (conductor of the Meiningen Orchestra).

Mr. Denhof's scheme is also announced, and the artists at his concerts include the names of Lady Hallé, Sarasate, Kubelik, Halir, Klengel, Zacharewitsch, Becker, and Hollman, as well as the vocalists Camilla Landi, Mary Münchhoff, and Dr. Lierhammer. The Amateur Orchestral Society, of which Mr. Collinson is conductor, issues its scheme of three concerts with most interesting programmes.

In addition to the works already mentioned the following will be the principal choral performances during the season: 'The Revenge' and 'Dettingen Te Deum,' by the University Musical Society; 'The Spectre's Bride,' by Mr. Kirkhope's choir; 'The Messiah,' by Mr. Moonie's choir; 'The Golden Legend,' by the Choral Union; 'Elijah,' by the Western Choral Society; and More Smieton's 'Ariadne,' by the Corstorphine Choral Society.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

To the prospective events noted in last month's issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES, the following have to be added:—Govan Choral Union (Mr. Alec Steven, conductor), a Society formed last year under influential auspices, have in hand Wallace's 'Maritana,' the 'Messiah,' and 'Elijah.' This year the Paisley Choral Union have, for a regrettable lack of public support, abandoned their scheme of subscription concerts, and the Society's only appearance will be at the customary 'Messiah' concert at Christmas.

The Orpheus Club, under Mr. James Barr, again draw upon Sullivan, 'Princess Ida' being the opera selected for this season. With characteristic enterprise the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society announce a first public performance in Glasgow of Bach's Concerto for three pianofortes and string orchestra, and W. H. Reed's Suite Venitienne, in addition to Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem 'Le Rouet d'Omphale.' Several minor musical events have taken place during October, among which may be mentioned Mr. Wilfrid Senior's pianoforte recital. Mr. Senior, for several years a pupil of Dr. Gustav Wolff at Dresden, has recently settled in Glasgow, and at his first public appearance on October 6, his brilliant technique and musicianly readings made an exceedingly favourable impression. Professor Niecks has delivered two very able lectures under the auspices of the local section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians and of the Glasgow Society of Musicians.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Philharmonic Society commenced their season on October 11 with an exceedingly interesting concert. The programme included Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Mendelssohn's Overture 'Melusine,' of which works Dr. Cowen obtained admirable renderings. M. Raoul Pugno played the solo part in Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor with his well-known masterfulness, and Mlle. Antonia Dolores sang.

M. Pugno gave a pianoforte recital at the Philharmonic Hall on October 18, when the high opinion formed of him at the Philharmonic concert was confirmed.

Mr. Theodore Lawson, who has been a prominent figure and done much for Liverpool music during the past twenty years, is about to leave the city for London. He was accorded a 'farewell concert' on October 18, which passed off under favourable circumstances.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Though a few isolated concerts were given early in October, —such as the violinello recital by Mr. Richardson, and the vocal recital by Miss Guthrie, who brought forward an exceptionally interesting series of songs by Brahms—the Manchester musical season may be said to have definitely begun with the Brodsky Quartet Concert on October 19.

Besides model renderings of a quartet by Haydn and Beethoven's last but one—that containing the 'Thanksgiving' movement in the Lydian mode—the concert was remarkable for a strikingly correct and satisfactory performance of Brahms's Second Violin and Pianoforte Sonata given by Dr. Brodsky and Mr. R. J. Forbes, a pupil of the late Mr. Dayas at the Royal Manchester College enjoying a considerable reputation as an accompanist.

At the first Hallé Concert on the following evening the programme was, as usual on the opening night of the season, purely orchestral. Dr. Richter gave an altogether superb interpretation of Beethoven's third 'Leonora,' Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' and the 'Parsifal' Prelude. Schubert's great Symphony in C major, which occupied the second part of the concert, was marred by the over-noisy treatment of the prominent trombone parts. There was a very large and enthusiastic audience, and a very warm and cordial greeting for the veteran conductor.

Mr. Brand Lane's first concert on October 22 brought the first opportunity in Manchester of hearing Elgar's pieces 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' of which three were given, with the proper orchestral accompaniment. They were admirably done, but the choir was not so successful in the more dramatic and significant 'Challenge of Thor,' from the same composer's 'King Olaf.' Among the special attractions of the occasion was Master Florizel von Reuter, with his 'Symphonie Royale' and astonishing violin-playing.

MUSIC IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A vocal and pianoforte recital was given on October 14 by Mr. Norman Ridley, who possesses a pleasant, well-trained baritone voice, and who sings with expression and taste, and Herr Sigmund Oppenheim, a capable performer. Mr. Arthur Darley, a new comer in our midst, contributed some excellently-played violin solos.

Noteworthy items of the Middlesbrough Musical Union concert of October 12 were quintets by Beethoven and Brahms, played by Messrs. Kruse, Inwards, Hobday, Younge, and Withers, and Schubert's two choruses (Op. 112), with pianoforte accompaniment.

The Jarrow Philharmonic Society have elected Mr. George Dodds to the post of conductor, in succession to Mr. J. Jeffries, who has resigned. The Society are rehearsing Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander' and Macfarren's 'May-Day.' The Wallsend Philharmonic Society are undertaking Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' The Northumberland Orchestral Society have in hand Schumann's B flat Symphony, Spohr's 'Jessonda' and Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overtures, and W. H. Reed's 'Suite Venitienne'—a well-chosen selection; while the Orchestral Society initiated last winter in South Shields by Mr. Adams—who meet avowedly for private rehearsal without the ultimate aim of public performance—are becoming acquainted with Beethoven's First and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphonies.

Much excitement has been raised locally by the victory of the Hebburn-on-Tyne Colliery Silver Band at the recent national competition held at the Crystal Palace, and the proud victors are meeting with demonstrations of enthusiasm throughout the whole of the industrial portions of Tyneside.

The Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society announce an interesting scheme of work, which, amongst other attractions, includes Gade's Noveletten (Op. 53), Handel's 12th String Concerto Grosso, an Elegy by Tchaikovsky, 'The Swan of Tuonela,' by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm' and Stanford's 'Last Post.'

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Chamber music in this city will be well represented during this season by Miss Cantelo's Subscription Concerts, at which Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet and Schumann's A major String Quartet will be special attractions. Amongst the artists, the engagement of Dr. Brodsky is noteworthy.

Miss Rose Feilmann gave her second annual concert on October 13 to a large audience. Her voice was heard to advantage in songs by Scarlatti, Bizet, Thomas, Lambert, and Guy d'Hardelot. She was ably assisted by Mr. Archy Rosenthal, pianist, and Mr. William Higley (baritone). Madame Storer gave a vocal recital on October 17, when she rendered songs by Mascheroni, Thomas, and Bemberg.

Nottingham had an opportunity of welcoming both Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Wood on October 25, when they assisted at a recital for two pianofortes given by Miss Alice Hogg and Miss Emily Roseblade, and the programme was culled from the works of Saint-Saëns, Sinding, Arenski, Liszt and Richard Strauss.

Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' was sung with instrumental accompaniment at St. John's Church on October 16, when the solos were taken by Master Rogers, Mr. Billyeald and Mr. Mellor; Mr. Arthur Richards presided at the organ.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A prominent feature of local musical activity is the large number of oratorio and cantata performances which are given, chiefly during the winter, in connection with various churches and chapels in the city and district. Though the standard of merit naturally varies, the renderings of these sacred works are, as a rule, adequate, while their value to those who take part and those who listen cannot be over-estimated. Two such performances were given at the beginning of the month, the work in each case being Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' At Norton Lees Church the conductor was Mr. Horace Reynolds, and the soloists Miss Bromage and Mr. J. S. Muslow. At Owlerton Church Mr. J. W. Marriott conducted, and Master Hall and Mr. A. Dawes were the chief soloists. On the same date (October 2) 'The Messiah' was performed at Oak Street Chapel, Heeley, under the direction of Mr. Henry Kirk.

The Burngreave Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Haydn's 'Creation' on October 6. Mr. H. C. Jackson, who conducted, is to be congratulated on the forceful and intelligent singing of the chorus. The soloists were Miss Ethel Bird, Mr. W. H. Burrows, and Mr. H. Reynolds.

Prospective announcements of the season's music-makings in Sheffield and its neighbourhood were given in last month's issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the time of writing the musical season in Yorkshire has only just begun, and it is not until November has well set in that it can be said to be in full swing. Leeds has been fully occupied with its Festival, but on Saturday, October 15, Mr. Fricker—who, as chorus-master for that event, has had his hands very full for months past—resumed his Leeds Municipal Concerts, to which I have more than once referred as likely to do a good work for the music and musicians of the town. The Municipal Orchestra he has got together numbers only fifty performers, so that the strings must inevitably be outweighed by the brass; but apart from this the quality of the band is exceedingly good in every section, the players being very carefully chosen, including the best executants in the town, and maintaining throughout a high level. In the 'Italian' Symphony the efficiency of each individual player was shown in the clearness and refinement of the performance, which left no ragged ends. Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture was brilliant in effect, and the 'Kaiser' Waltz of Johann Strauss was very welcome as a practical illustration of the fact, too often forgotten, that music can be light and at the same time highly artistic. Miss Ella Child, a refined, sensitive, young pianist, played Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise (Op. 22) with considerable charm, and Miss Clara J. Winder, a Leeds vocalist, showed much promise in Beethoven's great scena 'Abscheulicher.' It is intended to give a series of twelve of these Municipal concerts during the coming season. Two of Beethoven's Symphonies, one of Mozart's, two of Tchaikovsky's, and Dvorák's 'From the New World,' are promised, together with many interesting pieces of smaller dimensions, among them a Concertstück by Mr. F. K. Hattersley, a Leeds musician whose Symphony proved so interesting a feature of last year's concerts. Considering that a ticket for a reserved place in the best part of the hall can be procured for the entire series at the cost of but ten shillings, and that the prices of admission to a single concert range from one penny upwards, it will be seen that they are brought within the range of the slenderest purses, on which account, and still more by reason of their intrinsic merit, they thoroughly deserve all the encouragement that can possibly be afforded them.

The Leeds Bohemian Concerts, at which chamber music is played by a string quartet of local players,—Messrs. Elliott, Moxon, Haigh, and Giessing—began their sixth season on October 19, when, in addition to classics by Beethoven and Haydn, Dvorák's Quartet in F (Op. 96) was given. During the season it is proposed to perform quartets by Tchaikovsky, Glazounow, Vincent d'Indy, and Kiel, as well as many other more familiar works. Among prospective Leeds concerts the amalgamated series of Subscription and Philharmonic Concerts is the most prominent. The choral works to be heard during the coming season will include Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' the unqualified success of which at the recent Festival will ensure great interest in its repetition; 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which, after being ignored by Leeds, will be given by two distinct societies within a week; Brahms's 'Triumphlied' and 'Song of Destiny'; Stanford's 'Revenge,' and Bach's cantata 'Now hath salvation'; while among a capital list of orchestral compositions may be mentioned Brahms's Symphony in D, Dvorák's 'From the New World,' Strauss's 'Don Juan,' Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and Elgar's 'Cockaigne' and 'In the South' Overtures. The Choral Union Concerts are to include a Wagner programme, Haydn's 'Creation,' and Elgar's 'Gerontius' and 'Apostles,' the latter of which has already been given on two occasions by the Society, once at Leeds and once in York.

The Bradford Subscription Concerts begin their fortieth season this month. Berlioz's 'Faust' and Elgar's 'Apostles' are the two choral works chosen for performance. Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D is to be played by Mr. Kreisler at the first concert of the series, and Glazounow's Sixth Symphony will apparently be the only symphony heard during the series, as the other orchestral concert will consist exclusively of Wagner pieces. The Halifax Choral Society will concentrate their energies on 'The Messiah' and 'Elijah,' launching forth into less familiar ground at their last concert, when Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' and Stanford's Te Deum are to be given.

The Huddersfield Choral Society opened their season on October 14 with Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' of which a brilliant choral performance was given under Dr. Coward's direction, the principals being Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Charles Tree. In addition to the customary 'Messiah' performance, Sir Hubert Parry will visit Huddersfield to conduct his oratorio 'Judith,' the choral effects of which proved so suited to this powerful choir when it was given by the Society last season that a repetition was decided upon. The Middlesbrough Musical Union announce 'St. Paul' and Stanford's 'Elegiac Ode' as the chief choral features of their concerts, and the Hull Vocal Society will give Haydn's 'Creation,' together with a miscellaneous programme to include Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane,' Parry's 'Song of Darkness and Light,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' The Hull Philharmonic Society, who devote themselves to orchestral music, promise Mozart's 'Prague' Symphony, Dvorák's Second Symphony, Elgar's 'Variations,' and the 'Cinderella' Suite which Mr. G. T. Patman, the clever musician who is organist of Bridlington Priory Church, wrote for one of the Bridlington Festivals. The 'Samson and Delilah' of Saint-Saëns and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding Feast' are among the works chosen by the Harrogate Choral Society, and the Keighley Musical Union, who are to give 'Elijah' at their second concert, promise something less hackneyed at their first, when Goring Thomas's 'Fire Worshippers' is to be heard, together with Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri.' The York Musical Society will give Stanford's 'Revenge' and Mozart's 'Requiem' during the season, together with a new cantata by Mr. T. Tertius Noble, their conductor, entitled 'Gloria Domini,' and having for its subject 'The Dedication of Solomon's Temple.'

Miscellaneous.

A new and important musical Institution was inaugurated in Montreal during the past month through the initiative of Mr. Charles A. E. Harriss entitled the McGill University Conservatorium. A large and influential staff, including many eminent teachers in the city, has been secured, and a new building has been provided through the generosity of Lord Strathcona, complete in all details, for the comfort both of professors and pupils. All branches of musical art will be represented, scholarships have been generously provided, and advanced pupils will have the opportunity of proceeding to the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music, and will rank as students of the McGill University, the statutes of the University already providing for the conferring of such degrees. In addition to the ordinary invitation students' concerts, a series of six to twelve historical concerts will be given during the session by the staff of the Conservatorium, aided by advanced students. Mr. Charles A. E. Harriss has been appointed Principal.

The Mayor of Leicester (Mr. Alderman Sawday) formally opened, on October 3, an important addition to the higher-class musical resources of the district by the inauguration of the Victoria Hall and Galleries. The new Institution, placed in the centre of Leicester, is an imposing stone structure of five storeys with a tower, designed by Mr. E. Burgess, and erected at a cost of over £30,000. Five floors will be entirely devoted to the promotion of high-class music in the Midlands, and the whole of the arrangements are on a scale commensurate with that object. The chief features include the provision of the Victoria Hall for chamber concerts, an orchestral room, and rooms for private tuition in both vocal and instrumental music. The Institution is the outcome of the efforts of Mr. Alderman J. Herbert Marshall, of Leicester, and Regent Street, London, who has practically devoted the whole of his leisure to the promotion of music. The Mayor of Leicester congratulated Alderman Marshall and the town on what promised to add immensely to the higher musical culture of the Borough and district.

The scheme of Historical Concerts prepared by Professor Niecks at the University of Edinburgh, for the winter, 1904-5, is as follows:

First and Second Concerts: Recitals of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas by Mr. Frederic Lamond.

Third Concert: 'Jonah,' an Oratorio by Carissimi, and (for comparison) part of Handel's first English Oratorio 'Esther.' Performers: The Choir of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, conducted by Mr. T. H. Collinson, Organist of the Cathedral.

Fourth Concert: The Overture, from Monteverde to Wagner. Performers: An Orchestra consisting of members of the Scottish Orchestra, conducted by Professor Niecks.

A member of the Musicians' Company has generously provided for the delivery of a series of free Academical Lectures, intended to guide students in the proper course of study for obtaining University degrees in music. The lecturers and their subjects are as follows: 'The History of Music,' Dr. W. H. Cummings; 'Counterpoint and Composition,' Dr. E. Markham Lee; 'Form and Analysis,' Dr. H. A. Harding; 'Orchestration and Instrumental Colouring,' Dr. E. H. Turpin. Each of these gentlemen will give four discourses on his special subject. The lectures will be delivered at the Guildhall School of Music, Thames Embankment, on successive Wednesday afternoons (except November 9), at 4 p.m. Full particulars concerning them may be obtained from the Secretary of that Institution.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society—of which Mr. Clifford B. Edgar, J.P., is President, and Dr. Charles E. Jolley conductor—announces an interesting series of choral and orchestral performances during the coming season.

The recently-formed Girls' School Music Union held their second conference at the High School, Baker Street, W., on October 15. There was a large gathering of members. Miss Strong gave an address on 'The Teaching of Choral Singing in Girls' Schools,' and Dr. P. C. Buck spoke on 'The Value of Technique in Pianoforte Playing.' He maintained that there was too much worship of technique in girls' schools generally and too little regard for utility. At Harrow, boys were taught to play hymn-tunes and even to transpose and to vamp, but the average girl could not do any of these things although she might be able to worry a Liszt Rhapsody or a Chopin study. After the business of the meeting was over, Madame Brema delighted the audience by singing several pieces in her best style.

Mr. John Brinsmead celebrated his ninetyeth birthday on October 13. He started in business for himself in 1837, just before Queen Victoria's accession to the Throne. Born at Wear Gifford, North Devon, he began life as a farmer. He was subsequently apprenticed to a cabinet maker at Torrington, and on coming to London entered a piano factory as journeyman. When Mr. Brinsmead first started making pianofortes he had one man and a boy. Notwithstanding his ninety years he still visits the showrooms in Wigmore Street daily, and is so hale and hearty that he may live to become a centenarian!

Professor Julius Buths has accepted Sir Charles Stanford's 'Requiem' for performance during the current concert season of the Düsseldorf Städtischer Musikverein. Other English works to be introduced into the Rhineland by Professor Buths are Mr. Arthur Hinton's Pianoforte Trio in D minor, and a Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. Fritz Delius. Professor Buths will play the solo part in this work at Elberfeld, in which town an opera by the Yorkshire composer was produced last year, after Professor Buths had paved the way for him with a performance, at Düsseldorf, of his symphonic poem, 'Paris, a Night-piece.'

The first of a new series of concerts given by Mr. B. Holländer's orchestra took place at Kensington Town Hall on October 12, and included Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and three of Dvůřák's Slavonic Dances. A new Violin Concerto (Op. 15) by Mr. Holländer, played in spirited style by Miss Jeannie Levine, is an interesting and effective work which deserves to be heard again. Miss Anna Fyshe, a Canadian pianist, made a very successful début in Chopin's Concerto (Op. 21). The orchestra played beautifully.

The Choral and Orchestral Union of the Bermondsey Settlement announce performances of the following works, under the direction of Mr. John E. Borland: 'Elijah,' 'Hiawatha' (complete), 'Revenge' and 'Phaëdra' (Crohoore) (Stanford), and Sir Hubert Parry's music to the 'Agamemnon' of Æschylus, for male chorus and orchestra. The full prospectus of the operations of the Bermondsey Settlement gives abundant proof of the splendid philanthropic work that is being carried on in that quarter of London.

Under the experienced conductorship of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, the Highbury Philharmonic Society—now in their twenty-seventh season—have chosen the following selection of music to be performed during the winter of 1904-5: Dvůřák's 'Spectre's Bride,' Mr. Edward German's new Welsh Rhapsody (which had such a remarkable success at the recent Cardiff Festival), a concert-recital of Gounod's 'Faust,' in addition to a concert devoted to 'Selections from Oratorios.'

The September issue of Miscellanea Genealogica et Heraldica contains the first instalment of the monumental inscriptions transcribed by Mr. A. J. Jewers, at St. Anne's, Soho, a church associated with the tune St. Ann's and its composer, Dr. Croft, sometime organist.

The report of the death of Mr. Adolf Rosenbecker, the well-known conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, fortunately proves to be unfounded. He and his excellent Orchestra accompanied Sir Alexander Mackenzie on his Canadian tour last year, and they will probably again co-operate with the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music in a second series of Musical Festivals to be given in the Dominion.

The Streatham Choral Society, under their new conductor, Dr. Cuthbert Harris, intend to perform during the coming season Beethoven's Mass in C, Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' Handel's 'The Messiah' and 'Ode to St. Cecilia's Day,' in addition to Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George.'

The West London Choral Association and Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. William Holmes) celebrated its coming of age by a concert at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street, given on October 4. The Society is doing good work in its modest way and deserves all encouragement.

Mr. H. Lyell-Taylor has resigned his positions as principal second violin and deputy-conductor of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, of which he has been a member since its foundation, on account of increasing engagements.

Professor Sevcik has been decorated by the Emperor of Austria with the Knight's Cross of the Franz Joseph Order.

ERRATUM.—In October issue, p. 648, col. 2, lines 4 and 5 to read (after 'Middlesbrough'): at Lincoln, and at Glasgow Cathedral.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

COLCHESTER.—The annual meeting of the Choral Society was held on October 4, under the presidency of the Mayor. A satisfactory report was presented, and it was stated that the training of the orchestra had been entrusted to Mr. George Wilby, the choir remaining under the control of Mr. Charles Osmond. The chief works chosen for performance during the season were Elgar's 'King Olaf' and Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony.

HANLEY.—The Burslem Choral Union gave a concert on October 13. The programme included a long selection from 'The Flying Dutchman,' the performance of which occupied the whole of the second half of the concert. The Overture was admirably played by the Hallé Orchestra, and the choir sang the Spinning Chorus excellently. Miss Gleeson-White (Senta), Mr. Webster Millar (Erik), and Mr. Charles Tree (The Dutchman) were the principal solo vocalists, the music of Mary and Daland being sung by two clever amateurs—Miss Grant and Mr. S. H. Glover. Even more interesting was the performance of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane.' The composer conducted for the first time in a district where he is so well known and liked. The choir sang well, and Miss Gleeson-White rendered the Prologue and Epilogue in an admirable manner. The further items of this interesting programme included an organ solo with orchestral accompaniment by Mr. J. Weston Nicholl, which was played by the composer and created much interest. Mr. John Cope, the conductor, and all others concerned may be congratulated on an altogether satisfactory performance.

IPSWICH.—Mr. Edwin Nunn inaugurated a series of Chamber Music Concerts with an 'At Home' given in the Lecture Hall on September 22. The series will consist of six concerts to be given monthly between October 27 and April 27. It is to be hoped that the experiment of introducing chamber music in this town will meet with success.

KIMBERLEY (S. AFRICA).—The Musical Association gave the second concert of their fourth season on September 7, when 'Judas Maccabæus' was performed. The chorus and orchestra numbered eighty performers, under the direction of Mr. J. Frank Proudman.

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES.—The Choral Society directed by Dr. A. P. Alderson announce Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' and Brahms's 'Requiem' for performance in the Parish Church during the present season.

OTTAWA.—The termination of Lord and Lady Minto's official residence here was signalized by a State Concert, arranged by Mr. Charles Harriss. During their residence their Excellencies have displayed so deep an interest in the advancement of musical art, and their support was of such great value to the series of Musical Festivals conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie last year, that nothing could have been more appropriate than this 'musical farewell.'

RIPON.—The Choral Society and Festival Choir will perform the following works during the coming season: Brahms's Requiem (third annual performance), 'Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'St. Matthew' Passion (third annual performance)—all the foregoing in the Cathedral—in addition to Stanford's 'Phaëdrig Crohoore' and Somervell's 'Power of Sound,' in the Victoria Hall. The Training College Choir will give a performance of Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri,' and the newly-formed Operatic Society announce three performances of 'The Pirates of Penzance.' All the works will be conducted by the Cathedral organist, Mr. C. H. Moody.

ST. JOHN'S, ANTIGUA (W. I.).—A concert of sacred music was given at Spring Gardens Moravian Church on September 26, under the able conductorship of the Rev. J. E. Weiss, who also presided at the organ. The chief feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' performed by a combined choir of 110 voices (the Spring Gardens choir and contingents from the country stations). The choir, who were under the perfect control of and in sympathy with the conductor, sang with admirable expression and excellent attack, giving evidence of the most careful preparation. Special mention may be made of the duet and chorus 'I waited for the Lord' and the choruses 'The night is departing' and 'Ye nations.' The performance reflected the greatest credit on the conductor.

SMETHWICK.—The Choral and Orchestral Society opened their season on October 3 in the Town Hall with a successful performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha' (Parts 1 and 2). The chorus numbered ninety voices; and the orchestra, led by Mr. Harry Newman, was augmented for the occasion by a number of leading Midland professional players. Miss Amy Kendal, Mr. Walter J. Ottey, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard were the principal vocalists, and Mr. W. J. Peters conducted. A miscellaneous selection included the choruses 'Hail, bright abode' (Wagner), and 'Tis thy wedding morning' (Cowen).

SOUTHPORT.—The inaugural concert of the Southport Musical Festival Association took place at Cambridge Hall on October 21, when a remarkably fine performance of Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was given. The choir displayed splendid tone and attack, and their dramatic realisation of the 'Demon Chorus' indicated their capacity for emotional singing. Indeed, their work altogether was of such a character as to call forth warm encomiums from Dr. H. Coward, who conducted. The credit of this is largely due to the ability of the choir trainer, Mr. A. W. Speed. The orchestra was also admirable, and it is sufficient to say that the contralto and tenor solos were once more in the safe hands of Miss Muriel Foster and Mr. John Coates, the bass soloist being Mr. Joseph Lycett. The success of this initial concert gives great promise for the future, and it is hoped that if satisfactory support is forthcoming, the performances will extend to more than one day, to be given either every second or third year, and the undertaking will then assume greater importance.

VENTNOR.—We learn with regret that the Choral Society, which has for nearly forty-five years flourished here under the skilful and energetic direction of Mr. Lemare, has ceased to exist. The Society, which was established in 1860, has done excellent work, and has performed a large number of standard works; but the strain of carrying it on unaided has become more than Mr. Lemare, with his increasing years, could sustain, and he has, with reluctance, been compelled to bring the Society to an end. Unless, therefore, someone can be found to step into the breach, this favourite watering-place will be without an important factor in musical life.

Answers to Correspondents.

W. A.—The tune 'Elgin,' immortalized by Robert Burns in his 'Cotter's Saturday Night,' seems to have first appeared in the Scottish Psalter, published by Edward Raban, at Aberdeen, in 1625. It contains fifteen common tunes harmonized in four parts, 'Elgin' being No. 14. Here is an old form of the melody of this plaintive Scotch psalm-tune:

You will find a harmonized version of the tune in 'The Psalter in metre and Scripture paraphrases' (with tunes), published by Mr. Henry Frowde, at prices from 1s. 3d. upwards.

C. A. C.—(1) Yes, it is quite possible for an organ to get out of tune after it has been tuned, especially if, as you say, the instrument is 'very, very old,' and that a local amateur 'cleaned it out and tuned it.' You say that it 'goes flat,' and that you detect it is the organ and not the voices that 'go flat.' Perhaps the climate of your West Indian colony may have something to do with this remarkable phenomenon. (2) Dr. Frederic Cowen was born at Kingston, Jamaica, January 29, 1852. He is an Englishman, and in answer to your further interrogation 'Who is he?' the reply is, 'A not unknown composer and conductor.'

G. M. P.—The longest biography (in English) of Herr Humperdinck is in Baker's 'Biographical Dictionary of Musicians' (Charles Woolhouse). An account of an interview with him (at Cologne) appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of July, 1895. (2) In addition to 'Hänsel und Gretel' and 'Die Wallfahrt nach Kevlaar' (mentioned by you), he has composed 'Dornröschen,' 'Die Königskinder' (a fairy operetta), incidental music to 'Der Richter von Zalamea,' 'Humoreske' for orchestra, Symphony in C, Moorish Rhapsody (Leeds Festival, 1898), &c.

J. B. W.—(1) Sullivan's hymn-tune 'St. Gertrude' (to 'Onward, Christian soldiers') originally appeared without the additional tenor notes in bar 4 of the refrain: they seem to have been first inserted in the original edition of 'Church Hymns,' edited by Sullivan. (2) The cadential form of the National Anthem in the new 'Methodist Hymn Book' is not new; it is often used by solo singers; but 'the great congregation' are less likely to use the slurred notes on the word 'save,' and will probably adhere to the simpler syllabic method to which, through long usage, they are accustomed.

A. S.—We are scarcely competent to pronounce upon a matter of Colonial etiquette; but it would seem quite natural and appropriate that the National Anthem should be played (or sung) 'in any part of a cathedral service, to mark the advent in the Colony (or Island), and the first attendance of a new Governor at the said service,' he being the representative of the King. See the 1st Epistle of Peter, chapter ii., verse 17, especially the last clause of that verse.

THEORY.—It is impossible for us to say whether by advertising you would obtain pupils—presumably by correspondence—in harmony, counterpoint, and the theory of music. The mere fact that teachers of theory do, by advertisement, make known their willingness to give theoretic instruction may be some indication of resultant success.

A CONSTANT READER.—The Roman numerals above Exercise 2 on page 48 of Stockhausen's 'Method of Singing' (English translation) refer to the degrees of the scale: I. = do, IV. = fa, II. = re, V. = sol, the numbers thus agreeing with the syllables beneath the notes.

SEVEN-SEVENTEEN.—(1) Write to Mr. T. W. Taphouse, 3, Magdalen Street, Oxford, for information as to the procuring of instruments of the harpsichord species. (2) The Psalter in use at York Minster is, we believe, that known as 'Monk and Ouseley's.'

VINGT ET UN.—Yes, it is quite true that a mixture stop on the organ is not altogether pleasant when used alone; it is improved when stops of sixteen, eight and four feet are added, and still further when the aid of one or two reeds is invoked. (2) The terms 'trill' and 'shake' are synonymous.

H. J.—(1) The small note (B) in bar 1, vocal part, of Mozart's air 'Zeffiretti lusinghieri' (Idomeneo) should be sung as an acciaccatura. (2) Pronounce the word 'ne'er' in singing as you would in speaking (nare), not as 'near.'

MUTE.—Submit your violin to Messrs. W. E. Hill and Sons, 140, New Bond Street, who, for a moderate fee, will tell you whether the instrument is a genuine Guarnerius or not.

G STRING.—No; an arrangement of Jackson's Te Deum for pianoforte and violin does not seem to have been perpetrated.

F. C.—As before stated in this column we regret that we cannot give the names of teachers. Will correspondents kindly note this?

G. H.—For practice in playing from the alto and tenor clefs, see 'Examples in Strict Counterpoint' (2 books), by Dr. Gordon Saunders, in Novello's Primer Series.

A. R. C. M.—The Vorschlag in both the Bach instances you mention should be long. See Mr. Dannreuther's 'Ornamentation' Primers, wherein the subject is exhaustively treated.

DORA.—We do not know of a pianoforte solo called 'Sweet Peas.' Do you not mean 'Suite de Pièces'?

Mrs. ST. C.—The earliest volumes of the Musical World, (1836, &c.), are not of any great intrinsic value.

"Mr. Fredericks sang very tastefully and with faultless expression.

... Mr. Fredericks gave a very pathetic rendering of the mourning of Jephtha, 'Deeper, and deeper still,' and he sang 'Sound an alarm' ('Judas'), in a magnificent manner."—Derbyshire Advertiser, April 2, 1904.

"Such a large portion of the recitatives and solos fell to the lot of Mr. Fredericks, that only a soloist of such magnificently professional capabilities as Mr. Fredericks could possibly have rendered and sustained to the end without any appearance of loss of voice the music allotted to him in these oratorios. It is awkward where every item is so well done to make a special selection, but there is no doubt that his dramatic rendering of the air, 'The sorrows of death,' from the 'Hymn of Praise,' was the feature of the evening."—High Peak News, April 4, 1903.

WELSH RHAPSODY

FOR ORCHESTRA
COMPOSED BY EDWARD GERMAN.

Pianoforte Arrangement, Three Shillings.

Full Score and Orchestral Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

It is a true Rhapsody, founded on four characteristic Welsh melodies, which are not only beautiful in themselves, but sound in this work as if confined in order to be thus contrasted. There are four sections in the Rhapsody, each based on its own melody. . . . The Rhapsody is, in point of fact, a kind of miniature symphony. It will certainly add considerable lustre to Mr. German's fame, for it is superior to any concert composition of his since the "Henry VIII." music, and the skill, more especially of his treatment of the last tune, where fragments are banded over the whole orchestra with splendid humour, is not only remarkable, but exactly characteristic of the composer.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The Rhapsody is a highly ingenious and attractive composition, richly scored, and having the advantage of those airs not only excellent, but more or less familiar to the public. . . . Mr. German handles these melodies with consummate skill, making each the basis of various readings and abounding flights of fancy which keep interest alive to the end. Moreover, the themes are arranged to bring the whole work into something like recognised musical form. . . . I cannot but place this Rhapsody among the very best things which Mr. German has done. It will be immensely favoured as well by a cultured audience as by a popular gathering. The work appeals, in short, to those who in music are gentle, and equally to those who are simple.

STANDARD.

The work is most richly scored, and attests in a marked degree to Mr. German's thorough musicianship. The success of the composition was instantaneous, and the cheers and applause were of the heartiest kind. It is, indeed, an exhilarating and stirring production which will probably speedily make its way into many concert rooms.

MORNING POST.

This work is founded on five Welsh melodies, the last being the famous "Men of Harlech." The manner in which the composer has manipulated his tunes is worthy of all admiration. With his mastery over instrumental resources he has devised many ingenious combinations, employed piquant rhythms, and finally brought his work to an imposing close with the grand Welsh melody played by the orchestra at its fullest.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Edward German is a fortunate young composer. . . . His latest composition, which he calls a Welsh Rhapsody, is certain to sustain his reputation as a musician. It is pleasing in conception, and brilliantly orchestrated. It was performed for the first time yesterday afternoon at the Cardiff Musical Festival, and at the close the composer, who conducted, was called three times to acknowledge the enthusiastic cheers and applause of the crowded assembly.

DAILY NEWS.

I can say at once that not only does the new work mark a new departure in the composer's style, but it immediately places him in the front rank of native composers who are helping in the renaissance of British music. . . . To my mind, the most promising and original section of the work is that which deals with "David of the White Rock." It shows a greater power of working-up than Mr. German has hitherto displayed. The opening section, too, is impressive and simple, and is a finely-contrasted introduction to the tranquil section which follows. But, indeed, the whole work is a welcome contribution to British musical art.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Mr. German has selected his materials well, and has made an admirable use of them. First we have a quick, bright movement based on the air "Loudly proclaim o'er land and sea," which forms a dignified exordium to the work. This leads without a break—for the Rhapsody resembles Liszt's well-known Hungarian Rhapsodies, in being continuous in form as well as in being based on folk-tunes—into a sort of scherzo formed out of two tunes, "Hunting the Hare," and "The Bells of Aberdovey," which are combined and contrasted with infinite resource and much charm, while the form of the first-named suggests the sort of tarantella rhythm in which Mr. German's soul delights. A slow movement is founded on the expressive tune "David of the White Rock," and as it fades away the finale begins with an almost imperceptible march rhythm which by degrees grows into the famous "March of the Men of Harlech." This is worked up gradually, culminating in a broad and dignified presentment of the theme. . . . In one sense I think the Rhapsody shows an advance, for while it is as beautiful as his music always is in its finely-wrought details, it is broader in general effect, and the well-chosen tunes have given a real emotional charm to the melodic material of the work.

SONATA IN D MINOR FOR THE ORGAN

COMPOSED BY
ALFRED H. ALLEN.

Price Three Shillings.

"Organists may be recommended a Sonata in D minor by Alfred H. Allen. This is an extremely well-written work by one who evidently is an expert organist. In the Prelude the composer employs the rarely-used seven-four, alternating with three-four, tempo. His counterpoint flows naturally and without effort. There is an excellent fugal section in this movement. The Intermezzo is melodious and simple in construction, an Allegretto Scherzando in the middle affording effective contrast. The Finale worthily concludes the sonata."—Morning Post.

THE MUSIC TO KING ARTHUR

WRITTEN BY

J. COMYNS CARR

COMPOSED BY

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

ARRANGED FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCE BY WILFRED BENDALL.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In 1894 the late Sir Arthur Sullivan accepted a commission from Sir Henry Irving to compose incidental music to Mr. Comyns Carr's drama of "King Arthur." The work was produced at the Lyceum Theatre, on January 12, 1895, and proved a great artistic success. After the withdrawal of the drama it was suggested to the composer that it would be a pity to allow such beautiful music to remain unpublished and become forgotten, and that a selection from it might be arranged in the form of a short concert-cantata. . . . After the composer's death it was decided to revert to the original proposition regarding the music, and the present concert-arrangement is the result.

AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS (STABAT MATER)

FOR

SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

ANTON DVOŘÁK

(OP. 58)

THE ENGLISH ADAPTATION BY

FRED. J. W. CROWE

(Organist of Chichester Cathedral)

THE ACCOMPANIMENTS ARRANGED FOR THE ORGAN BY

H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

NOTE.

This English version of Dvořák's "Stabat Mater" brings the beauties of the work within the reach of those who, for various reasons, prefer not to use the original Latin. The adaptation avoids the use of any passages of a controversial nature, thus making it available for use in any English place of worship; and, whilst preserving as far as possible the original rhythm, no pains have been spared to make this English version both vocal and practical.

Chichester, 1904.

F. J. W. C.

The accompaniment, while not professing to be purely an organ arrangement (which would necessitate the use of three staves), will, it is hoped, be found useful at the organ and at the same time easily playable on the piano at rehearsals.

Very few suggestions as to stops have been made, but the plain indication of the pedal part throughout the work and of the instrumentation (marked in brackets) will be a useful guide to the organist in his interpretation of this complex score.

THE VICTORY OF ST. GARMON

A SHORT DRAMATIC CANTATA FOR

BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

HARRY EVANS.

OLD NOTATION, 1s. 6d. SOL-FA, 9d.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

I have already said something regarding this cantata, and now there is only need to state positively, after repeated hearing, that Mr. Evans has written music which shows other Welsh composers how to break up the stagnation of their native art. . . . There is evidence of thought and utterance sometimes bordering on originality, and always giving proof of aptitude and power.

MORNING POST.

It is a pleasure to be able to congratulate Mr. Harry Evans on an extremely clever and effective work. The music denotes imagination and fancy. There is poetry in the opening chorus, and the battle scene reveals dramatic power. Altogether the work displays great earnestness and promise.

DAILY NEWS.

There is much in the work that has the merit of freshness and poetic feeling. It is also effective for the choir, and gives it just the mingled tenderness and fire to express that the Welsh singers love. . . . The immense enthusiasm with which he and his work were received may be considered an indication of the real work of this Festival in the future.

STANDARD.

The incidents are well arranged for musical treatment, and Mr. Harry Evans, the composer, has made excellent use of the opportunities afforded him. . . . After a brief instrumental prelude the chorus enters with a poetically and gracefully conceived number setting forth the tranquil beauties of a calm evening. As the Christian Army sinks to sleep Garmon prays for victory on the morrow. The peaceful opening is very engaging, and provides an effective contrast to the subsequent turmoil of the battle scene. . . . The composer has worked up this climax with great skill and dramatic perception.

MORNING LEADER.

"St. Garmon" is a work of very modern tendencies, and as such deserves the warmest encouragement. Moreover, it has elements of strength and sincerity which are very welcome.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"A work from the pen of the composer of 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc' will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Will assuredly soon be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers. . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner. . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—'The Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—"This Society came forward with the first performance in London of Mr. Gaul's Cantata 'The Ten Virgins.' The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. If the verdict of a miscellaneous audience, that could have no possible reason for being favourably prejudiced, is of any account in estimating the merit of a new work, a career that will rival that of the same composer's 'Holy City' may be predicted for 'The Ten Virgins.' That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

JOHN GILPIN

BALLAD FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE POEM WRITTEN BY COWPER

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

VOCAL SCORE, PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. String Parts, Full Score and Wind Parts (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

In many respects Dr. Cowen has accomplished much in this "trifle." The ballad occupies but twenty short minutes in performance. His humour, it is true, is often of a very obvious kind; but it may be that in a work like this, evidently intended for small choral societies, for which it is admirably adapted, a certain amount of obviousness must be arrived at. . . . But on humour Dr. Cowen does not wholly depend, for he writes now and then passages that come near to being beautiful, as in the accompaniment to the words "And my sister's child." The tune which is used at the verse "For saddle-tree scarce reached had he" is excellent, and so is that at the beginning of the end, "Away went Gilpin." In short, the ballad is a very good example of what such ballads are expected to be, not too long, not too extortionate in the demands it makes on either chorus or orchestra—or, for that matter, on the hearer.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

By a happy inspiration, Mr. Cowen has preferred to skim along the surface between Cheapside and Ware, guided by the genius of poor Cowper in one of his rare moments of cheerfulness. . . . His music is, in its way, as humorous as the words, and I cannot sufficiently praise the finesse with which he has surmounted certain very obvious difficulties due to the unchanged rhythm of the ballad, and the unavoidable need to suggest without monotony the beat of the horse's hoofs. . . . The orchestration is as brilliant and fanciful as anybody can desire. It "keeps the game alive" in most strenuous fashion, and to it is largely due the fact that there is not a dull bar in the work.

STANDARD.

The humour of the amusing ballad has been very happily caught, and its most diverting situations are illustrated with a directness and point that considerably increase their comicality. . . . As will be surmised, coming from the pen of such a consummate master of orchestration, the accompaniment abounds with deft and subtle touches that prompt the imagination of the listener, and increase the significance of the words. . . . The work was sung and played con amore, and at the close Dr. Cowen received quite an ovation.

MORNING POST.

The success of his new work was never for a moment in doubt. The attention was arrested from the opening, and the humorous suggestions, such as the allusion to the good old song "The Roast Beef of Old England" and the realistic imitation of the braying of an ass, were readily seized and greatly relished. The work is wonderfully graphic; it abounds in amusing details and pursues its course brilliantly without flagging. It all goes with a snap. Sung con amore by the chorus it was received with acclamation, the composer being cheered with true Welsh enthusiasm. There can be no doubt that "John Gilpin" is destined to become widely popular.

DAILY NEWS.

It is easy for the choir, defective, and it is not over elaborated. . . . The bright, skilful little work would probably be even more effective if sung by a smaller choir.

PALM MALL GAZETTE.

The result is a triumphant piece of delightfully humorous music, in which music is by no means forgotten in the humour. It has been strange to note how Dr. Cowen, who, by the way, wrote this Choral Ballad specially for the Cardiff Festival, has increased his grip upon music to such an extent that at the present moment whatever whim or fancy may occur to him, he finds it well within the limits of his intellectual outlook, and can express it precisely as he wishes to express it; that is to say, if one may steal a simile from literature, that every word is precisely suited to the idea, just as in his case (I speak now of "John Gilpin"), every idea is suited to the music. The work springs along from the outset. The Gallop of Gilpin, . . . right down to the egotistical cry of the author (that gentle humorist, Cowper),

And when he next doth ride abroad,

May I be there to see are realised without any violence, without the smallest indication of excessive thought, without any attempt at exaggeration, and yet with a pitter-patter and a swing which enhance every detail, from such a phrase as "Away went Gilpin," to the "Stop thief!"—matters which proclaim the work to be literally a miniature masterpiece.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"John Gilpin" proved to be exceedingly clever, and its simplicity makes it a suitable work for small choral societies, with whom it is certain to become popular. . . . "John Gilpin," in a word, is a delightful composition.

OBSERVER.

Those who know the composer only by the music he has hitherto given to the world will hardly have credited him with the possession of humour in so great a degree as he has here shown. . . . "John Gilpin" is of humour all compact, not a bar of it failing to contribute something to the hilarity which pervades the work, and (be it said) honourably distinguishes it among contemporary productions, which, for the most part, are designed to make us feel sad, if not miserable. To the choir are allotted the strains in which the familiar lines are narrated. These follow the moods of the successive scenes with admirable fidelity, and are, moreover, very effectively laid out for the voices. . . . "John Gilpin," as set to music by Dr. Cowen, is, in short, a little masterpiece of genre-painting, and will probably be taken in hand by every self-respecting choir in the English-speaking world before the first anniversary of its birth.

MORNING LEADER.

Dr. Cowen was, in a special sense, the hero of the evening, for his new choral ballad, "John Gilpin," was produced and was greeted with the utmost enthusiasm. It is a peculiarly exhilarating and enjoyable little work. The adjective is used in no disparaging sense. On the contrary, one of the great merits of it is that it makes no attempt to be bigger than the text. Dr. Cowen has caught the right atmosphere of genial simplicity and mock solemnity which characterises Cowper's poem. . . . The reception of the work was tremendously enthusiastic.

MORNING ADVERTISER.

I have seldom heard anything more racy or more thoroughly humorous than Dr. Cowen's setting of the narrative of John Gilpin's unpremeditated ride to Ware and back. Before the score had passed its third page there was a broad grin on the faces of the majority of the audience, and ere the end was reached the grin had developed into a hearty laugh. . . . "John Gilpin" is the brightest example of humorous music we have had since the days of Gilbert and Sullivan opera at the Savoy. The chorus thoroughly entered into the spirit of the work, and the enthusiastic applause told how much it was appreciated. There is not a choral society in the United Kingdom, including Scotland, that should not instantly add it to its répertoire.

STAR.

Dr. Cowen's work is delightfully humorous, and the restraint and discretion with which the humour is employed makes it the more delightful. Its themes are all fresh and characteristic, and their treatment is not only ingenious but grateful to the singers.

YORKSHIRE POST.

It need hardly be said that so skilled and adroit a composer has made the utmost of every point in the ballad that can possibly suggest humorous effect. The paces of the steed and its snorting, the donkey's bray that for a second time urges it on its wild career, and even the mention of the "tedious years" of Gilpin's married life have suggested musical treatment calculated to enhance the quiet humour of the poem. . . . The "go" and brightness of the music are quite irresistible, and made a marked impression, which was enhanced by the exceedingly smart performance.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

Dr. Cowen's choral ballad is a work to be heard, not described. . . . The treatment is humorous and quite graphic. There seems more than a touch of satire in the adoption of a few representative themes and the working up of the points of climax in the approved style. The dialogue is carried by the different sections of the chorus, and the various incidents are depicted in the orchestra. The dog barks, the ass brays, and the frightened steed madly gallops away. The chorus fully entered into the fun of the thing, and the performance kept the audience on the verge of laughter all the time. The orchestral details would have done credit to Sullivan himself. The touches of realism were more in the nature of suggestion than imitation, but they could not be mistaken. The musicians were humorists themselves for the moment. Dr. Cowen was cheered to the echo both before and after the performance, and I really think the chorus wanted to sing "John Gilpin" over again.

SOUTH WALES DAILY NEWS.

To read of all the amusing things in the score may not give much idea of the music itself; it must be heard. The composer has shown great wisdom in not spinning out his music; he passes quickly from one stage to another of the adventure, and every now and then a moment's quiet affords relief. And the whole work takes under twenty minutes.

THE TIMES.

This is an admirable work in its way, with plenty of swing and tuneful movement, remarkable distinction of themes, and a delightful mingling of two different rhythms in alternation. It is capably scored in a style befitting the suggestion of the title, and, if the ballet were in a more artistic condition in London, Mr. Reed's name would not be unknown for long. It made a great success under the composer's direction.

STANDARD.

The nature of the fantasia is explained by its title. Its composer, who directed its performance, is well known to the frequenters of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, at which several of his compositions have been played. The themes of the fantasia are conventional; but clever use is made of various dance rhythms, and if the scoring is suggestive of an Empire ballet, it is appropriate to the subject.

THE SPECTATOR.

Mr. Reed also seems impressed by the need of "Mediterraneanising" our music, and it is an agreeable change from the oppressive strenuousness of some of the younger school to find a writer deliberately aiming at the diffusion of cheerfulness... his contribution to the gaiety of nations will be welcomed without reserve, for he has a genuine gift of tune-coining and an excellent knowledge of orchestral effect.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. W. H. Reed's orchestral fantasia "Scenes from the Ballet" is an ingenious and whimsical treatment of ballet rhythms, and displays an intimate knowledge of the resources of a modern orchestra.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

Mr. Reed's fantasia, as its title suggests, is based upon dance rhythm. It recalls, without being in any way like, Sullivan's "Overture di Ballo." The work is scored for a large orchestra, with full percussion and glockenspiel; it is replete with taking themes, and is admirably worked out.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

Mr. W. H. Reed's remarkably clever and attractive work is full of piquant melody and dainty orchestration. After this Mr. Reed should be heard of at the Festivals.

"A second performance of Rollason's beautiful setting of the 'Stabat Mater' was given in St. Michael's Church on Wednesday evening. . . . A second hearing confirms first impressions that it is a work of genius—as Canon Atkinson said at the close—a deeply reverent, sympathetic, and expressive setting of very beautiful words."—Coventry Herald.

"A feature of the service at St. Andrew's Church last evening, and which attracted a large congregation, was the rendering by the choir of F. Rollason's 'Stabat Mater Dolorosa.' In the solemnity of such surroundings and to an audience already impressed by the sacredness of the day, the beautiful music of this work, so touchingly descriptive of events connected with the Crucifixion, appealed with much force."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE A SACRED CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Is well ahead of all Mr. Gaul's previous efforts. . . . Special mention may be made of the treatment of the parable of the Prodigal Son, which occupies a conspicuous place."—Daily Star.

"The Victoria Hall, Hanley, was well filled by an audience who gave enthusiastic evidence of their approval of Mr. Gaul's music. The chorus and band numbered 350 performers. . . . Striking feature in the form of a delightfully instrumented Eastern dance in itself is sufficient to enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation."—STAFFORDSHIRE CORRESPONDENT, The Musical Times.

"Judged by the appreciative reception accorded it by the crowded audience at Griffithstown, it bids fair to eclipse the popularity of the same composer's 'Holy City.' . . . 'The Prince of Peace' is a work of an exceptionally high order. There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. The work is varied and interesting, and, like all of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, supplies a need which no other composer of music so satisfactorily meets, viz., a moderately difficult work written on classical lines. . . . The cantata occupied about ninety minutes, and from the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment. . . . Already we understand numerous requests have been made for an early repetition."—Pontypool Free Press.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . 'Thou art the King of Glory,' a singularly fine chorus, worthy of any composer, living or dead. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm. This cantata, which completes the octave of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, we hold to be the best. If it prove less popular than the composer's 'The Holy City,' we shall be surprised. Mr. Gaul was engaged on this, his latest work, for about three years, and we believe that all who hear it will agree that the time was very profitably spent."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"In every way worthy the great reputation and experience of its composer. . . . It is indeed a work of a very unusual character, and most probably destined to become more popular than any of his other compositions. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE TIMES.

Nothing that the composer writes can be otherwise than well written, and the workmanship is as ingenious and clever as we have a right to expect. There is an effective laughing chorus, a graceful and well-scored nocturne by way of intermezzo, some pretty rustic dance music, and a spirited "Song of the Corn" for baritone solo and chorus.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

I am glad to see the name of the Scottish composer attached to a work of considerable dimensions, and even more pleased with his choice of a subject. . . . The gentle Quaker-poet of New England tells the tale of the wronged maiden with charming simplicity, and is not to be blamed because he could not keep the witch and her cruel fate out of it. . . . The witch was inevitable in the cantata, and supplies the shadows required for pictorial effect. . . . The composer of "The Witch's Daughter" is fortunate in his theme, and had only to play up to it in order to make his work a success. This, in my opinion, he has done, so that it is scarcely rash to anticipate for to-night's novelty a very favourable reception at the hands of the public. . . . I may say of Sir Alexander's music in this case that all of it is informed with the spirit of the poetry. Even when it contrasts most strongly with Whittier's simple forms, the two things are never essentially at variance. That is an immense advantage, and one as rare as it is great. . . . I especially call attention to a "Mocking Chorus," in which the bucolics taunt Mabel with seeking to witch a man, and not a cow or a churn, as her mother did. Here we have the composer in the best of his lighter moods, and so good that, though applause was forbidden, to-night's audience made a spontaneous demonstration. Of still higher rank is the opening section of an epilogue written specially for this work by the late Julian Sturgis. Than the music to this Sir Alexander has given us nothing finer of its kind. It is masterly in the very highest degree.

STANDARD.

The music attests the hand of the musician on every page. . . . The first soprano solo is full of subtleties, and the number needs to be heard more than once to be duly appreciated. Much also may be said of the subsequent choruses in the first scene. . . . In the second scene, the chorus of female voices is beautifully written, and Mabel's prayer for death is pathetic. Harden's proposal and acceptance by Mabel contains many delicate touches, the latter's joy being very happily expressed. The subsequent chorus, "Blow, Winds of God," is most effectively developed, and brings this section to an imposing conclusion. The feature of the third scene is the "Corn Song," which, being a detachable piece, with a vigorous chorus, may become popular apart from the Cantata. The opening of the epilogue, for female voices, is charming, and the finale is a noble piece of choral writing.

MORNING POST.

Mention must be made of the bright opening movement, the dancing of maids and young men at the harvest festival, the soprano song "To weary hearts," and the close of the first of the three scenes into which the work is divided, and in which the jeering of the neighbours is cleverly depicted. Before Scene 2 there is an expressive and pleasingly-scored intermezzo, one may further notice the end of the second scene, a lively Corn Song with chorus, and a stately epilogue, the concluding lines of which were written by the late Julian Sturgis.

OBSERVER.

Few living musicians know better how to build up a climax, or a series of climaxes, than the Principal of the R. A. M., and "The Witch's Daughter" contains several examples of his skill in this direction—for instance, the chorus "The Broadest Lands," the finale to Scene 2, "Immortal Love," and the epilogue "Not in the old world's prime." Very bright and taking is the "Corn Song," for baritone solo and chorus, and great charm is shown in the chorus "Her tears of grief," the themes of which are also used in the nocturne which forms an intermezzo between Scenes 1 and 2.

ATHENÆUM.

The whole of the music shows very clever workmanship, but so light that much of it at first hearing escapes notice. . . . The most noticeable features—there is no break in each of the three scenes into which the work is divided—are the merry choral dance at the opening; the expressive aria "To weary hearts," with muted strings for the greater part; the finale of Scene 1 with its jeering section; the beautifully scored intermezzo; the love duet, especially the latter part, beginning with the broad phrase "Immortal Love"; the quaint "Corn Song," with chorus, and the stately close of the work. In his employment of representative themes Sir Alexander Mackenzie has been extremely moderate, and we are glad to find a prominent composer setting so good an example.

PRESS NOTICE.

"Eugen d'Albert, whose performances of classical pianoforte music may be called typical, has prepared a critically revised and instructive edition of Ludwig van Beethoven's Sonatas for the Pianoforte. It is of the greatest interest to follow one of the most eminent artists of our time in his progress through Beethoven's compositions. In contrast with many others with the same aim—his precursors in this field of work—Eugen d'Albert has been on the whole sparing with his notes and explanations on purely practical as well as musical details. But the player in a state of development will find abundance of help provided; while the accomplished artist is unimpeded, freely to unfold his individuality. The editor's utterances—given as foot-notes—always hit the mark with reference to the performance, and are, with all their brevity, of admirable exactness and precision of expression. They are original, and reveal the mind of a real artist, d'Albert, apart from his keenly-thought-out fingering, having given many dynamic and agogic hints, this excellent edition is highly to be recommended for teaching purposes. The 'New Testament of Pianoforte Music,' as Beethoven's Sonatas are called, in contradistinction to Bach's '48 Preludes and Fugues,' has but rarely found an interpretation commanding approbation for every detail like the present one by Eugen d'Albert."—Musikalisches Wochenblatt.

EVERYMAN

A CANTATA, FOUNDED UPON THE OLD MORALITY PLAY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

H. WALFORD DAVIES.

(OPUS 17.)

Vocal Score, Paper Covers, price Three Shillings net. Paper Boards, price Four Shillings net.
String Parts, 10s. 6d. per Set; Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.

THE TIMES, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

The evening concert began with the most important of the Festival novelties, the setting of an adaptation from the morality play of "Everyman," by Dr. H. Walford Davies, a work of far too great importance and musical interest to be discussed in a few hurried words. It made a great impression and was received with genuine enthusiasm. It will not be a matter of surprise if the Leeds Festival of 1904 should be known as the "Everyman" Festival, just as that of 1885 is called the "Golden Legend" year.

THE TIMES, OCTOBER 10, 1904.

Dr. Walford Davies has contrived to give his music an austere character and a kind of remoteness of style while allowing himself every resource of modern harmony and the use of the full modern orchestra. The words of the Deity, "I perceive here, in my Majesty," are set (for chorus) to a series of solemn chords, in which the dominant seventh is pre-eminent, and the opening notes of the work, representing "the passionless note of Death's horn" (we quote the admirable analysis by H. C. C.), form one of those sudden harmonic metamorphoses which would have been unimaginable by musicians of the past. This phrase and the opening passage of the song, "I am Death that no man dreadeth," give an extraordinary amount of character to the music; the clever characterization, of which this is a prominent example, is perhaps the most remarkable of the many fine qualities in the cantata. . . . The song of Knowledge, "O Glorious Fountain," with choral interludes, and the prayer of Everyman, belong to the most happily inspired pages in the work, but they are of a kind to which no written words can do justice. . . . As already recorded, the reception of the cantata was most enthusiastic.

THE WORLD, OCTOBER 11, 1904.

All the world which reads of musical doings in the daily papers knows now that a new composer of the first rank has revealed himself at Leeds. Just as Elgar stepped up, "Gerontius" in hand, to the platform where the tiny company of real English composers stood, so has Dr. Walford Davies arrived with his "Everyman." And this work shows high talent of so original and masterly a kind that it may well be asked if this latest arrival among the composers is not going in future to stand in front of them all. . . . I cordially echo the judgment of one whose opinion, but seldom given to the public, must ever carry the greatest weight: "Everyman" is the noblest work produced by an Englishman for many years."

DAILY NEWS, OCTOBER 8, 1904.

At a bound Dr. Walford Davies has sprung to the front rank of our younger composers, for here one has not only to praise technical achievement for its own sake, but also what is more rare, the resources of modern music employed for the expression of deep poetic ideas. . . . He has kept his music as simple as possible, and yet his language is a modern language and transfixes the heart of the old morality play, interpreting in music that which is for all time. The composer has shown nothing short of genius in his solution of the problem. . . . The appeal of Everyman to Kindred and Fellowship is full of a curiously sinister comedy, which one had not expected from Dr. Walford Davies on the strength of his previous musical achievements. It is impossible, however, to go into details concerning this remarkable work. . . . At the end of the work Dr. Walford Davies was received with an enthusiasm which is rare indeed.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

Dr. Davies, in his work "Everyman," must be held as a man of strength and brains. . . . The chorus and character of "Everyman" have the work to themselves, and it is all splendidly original.

OBSERVER, OCTOBER 9, 1904.

The most important novelty of the Festival, Dr. Walford Davies's setting of "Everyman," was heard on Thursday evening. . . . Dr. Davies's music has the great merit of being thoroughly sincere and appropriate. He has caught the spirit of the play, and produced a work that is far beyond anything he has previously done. There are pages in his setting of "Everyman" that indicate his possession of such qualities that the use of the word "genius" seems inevitable. The thematic material. . . is simple, and yet new in effect. How difficult of achievement is this combination perhaps only those who have tried their hand at composition can know. "Everyman" was an instantaneous success. Dr. Davies, who conducted, was cheered on his appearance in a way that showed that his music had already won its way into the hearts of his interpreters. . . . The chorus sang with enthusiasm born of conviction, and "Everyman" was launched on a career which should be long and prosperous, with every possible advantage in its favour.

DAILY TELEGRAPH, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

This evening Dr. Walford Davies submitted his cantata "Everyman" to the judgment of a large audience, conducting it himself, and receiving what appeared to be a unanimous verdict of approval. Those present who were pastmasters in the study of audiences could hardly make a mistake on this point. There is the silence of indifference and that of absorbed attention. Of these the last-named prevailed as the solemn "argument" of the old-time "Morality" was driven home by all the power of music supplementing its own inborn force. In fact, the audience could not have been more sensitive to the work had a voice from heaven spoken the opening lines, "I pray you all give your audience, and hear this matter with reverence." . . . In all music there is something above forms, to wit, the spirit, which may, like Providence, fulfil itself in many ways. Of this fact Dr. Walford Davies's work seems to me confirmation. It is modern, and yet one sees there that which in the past would have received other, though not necessarily truer, expression. . . . There is an element of originality in the work, with much play of forceful imagination, and a sure eye for the right effect at any given moment. Other opportunities will be found for elaborating these points; let it now suffice to say that the Temple organist has made his mark upon contemporary art.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, OCTOBER 10, 1904.

A musical work of deep seriousness must be touched by a very peculiar and indefinable quality if it is to reach the hearts of a public whose first love is musical comedy. "Gerontius" had this quality, and so has "Everyman," as it would seem, though the style of Dr. Davies's music is absolutely different from that of Elgar's. It is not easy to describe this style, for it is unlike anything that one has previously known, and owes not one jot or tittle to the influence of Elgar or anyone else, unless it be Bach, whose powerfully plain ideas of conveying expression have probably served as a guide to Dr. Davies. The music is astonishingly healthy and virile, almost rough at times, but there is not a bar which fails. In design so in detail; the composer has seized the right means of expression with a positively unerring instinct. To describe it as "unconventional" is to give but a faint idea of its newness. The composer has hampered himself with none of the ordinary conditions of cantata form; he uses his chorus and his soloists when he thinks best; he proposes none of the effects which can be got artificially; his one aim throughout is to enforce the meaning of the words as they come, and he has trusted to the power of directness and sincerity to make his appeal for him. The result is, without question, his justification. "Everyman" is a strange musical picture; it may even be "harsh and weird," but its strength carries the day; one can but hold one's breath and say that here is music which compels attention by its stern fascination.

YORKSHIRE POST, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

The feature of the day—and, as it will probably prove, the feature of the Festival—was reserved for the evening concert. This was "Everyman," Dr. Walford Davies's setting of the old morality play, which, in dramatic form, has lately been made familiar to the public. . . . Much was expected, and expectation was more than realised. There was a universal feeling last night that this weirdest of all cantatas is likely to rank as one of the great successes of the Festival. A great ovation awaited the composer at the conclusion of the performance. He had distinctly scored.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

Dr. Walford Davies's setting of "Everyman" as a cantata, specially written for this Festival, was heard this evening for the first time in public. It provoked a scene of quite exceptional enthusiasm, and there is no doubt that it is a striking, totally unconventional, and largely successful composition.

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH, OCTOBER 7, 1904.

It may be that the Leeds Festival of 1904 will remain memorable because of the production of "Everyman." In this setting of the impressive old morality play we have a sincere utterance, the putting forth of a distinct personality and intimate faith, that has not been paralleled since the "Dream of Gerontius" first saw the light.

HUDDERSFIELD EXAMINER, OCTOBER 8, 1904.

It was surprising, looking to the chromatic character of the music, what a vast amount of melodic beauty of the richest and purest character pervades it, especially in the choral and orchestral portions. The depth of expression and dignity of the work also seemed to gather strength.

The impersonation of Rinaldo has been sustained by Mr. William Wild, whom the Choral Society of Constantinople had especially engaged from England for this production. He possesses a fine tenor voice of sufficient strength, and above all, uses it very artistically."—Stanboul Journal, March 19, 1904.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

'This evening to Cambridge; and went first to St. John's College, well built of brick, and library, which I think is the fairest of that University.' Thus records John Evelyn on August 31, 1654. Let us follow the example of the famous diarist, and visit this venerable seat of learning.

Those who are familiar with the charming 'Backs' of Cambridge—particularly beautiful in the glow of an autumn sunlight—can hardly realize that those verdant surroundings were at one time 'a very poor and waste place of the commonality of the Town of Cambridge.' Such however was the state of the ground in the 12th century, when Henry Frost, an opulent Burgess of Cambridge, founded the Hospital of the Brethren of St. John the Evangelist in the year 1135. This was before the University or any hostel or college existed at Cambridge, the earliest college being Peterhouse, founded in 1284. Good Mr. Frost placed the hospital under the direction of a small community of Augustinian Canons, whose monastic duties consisted mainly in the performance of masses and in caring for the poor and infirm inmates of the hospital. In course of time, owing to serious mismanagement, the hospital came to an end by a bull of Julius II., who, in the year 1510, ordained the dissolution of the house.

The place which for nearly four centuries had been devoted to the healing of the sick was speedily transformed into an institution for the culture of the intellect. In the year 1511 the hospital was converted into the College of St. John the Evangelist, under the will of Lady Margaret Beaufort (1443-1509), mother of Henry VII., who also founded Christ's College and the professorship of Divinity which bears her name. Although Henry VIII. appropriated to himself nearly all the estates left by his grandmother to the College, in exchange (!) for some smaller estates, St. John's College has grown by numerous benefactions whereby it is second only to Trinity in size and wealth. The buildings erected on the site of the old hospital are exceedingly picturesque in their Tudor and Jacobean styles of architecture. The charm of the façade of the east front, scarcely altered, is enhanced by the noble entrance-gate, the most beautiful of all the gateway-towers in Cambridge. What could be more appropriate in the ornamentation of this imposing gateway than the band of daisies, or marguerites, inserted to commemorate the Lady Margaret, the generous Foundress of the College? For the remaining details of this splendid portal the reader is referred to the photograph on the preceding page.

The First Court, built 1510-20, is blemished on the south side by a building abomination of the 18th century. Of the Chapel, which occupies the north side, more anon. The Second Court, built 1598-1602, is a beautiful specimen of Elizabethan brickwork. Here are the Hall and the Fellows' Combination Room. From the Third Court (1669-73) is the (so-called) Bridge of Sighs which leads, across the river, to the New Court (1826-30) and on to the 'Wilderness,' a delightful spot forming a part of the leafy 'Backs' already referred to. The Fellows' Combination Room was formerly 'the Master's walking-place' (ambulatorium magistri), probably so called because of its use by that dignitary for his 'constitutionals' in wet weather. Although it has been reduced in length from 148 to 93 feet, this gallery, with its panelled walls and ceiling of rich plaster-work, is one of the finest specimens of its kind left in England. Its walls are enriched with portraits of distinguished alumni. Seen at night in the dim candle-light, this room forms a charming vista almost weird in its softened shadows. In strong contrast, not only in height and accommodation but in lighting, is the noble Hall as seen at the electric-lighted hour of dinner, upon the hospitable tables of which look down, in portrait representation, the Foundress and other worthies of the College.

The Library is of very special interest. Built 1623-28, chiefly at the expense of Dr. John Williams, a former Bishop of Lincoln and Lord Keeper, the building is a fine specimen of Jacobean Gothic. As will be seen from the photograph (p. 781), the bookcases are remarkably beautiful. The lower (alternate) cases have been raised in height to accommodate folio books; but the two cases nearest the door retain their original characteristics, with a sloping desk at the top on which books could be laid for study. In the College Statutes of 1530 it was enacted that the Library was to be guarded with especial care, and to be provided with 'duplicate catalogues, both on parchment.' Upon further examination of the photograph, a white space will be observed on the first bookcase at the right-hand side of the view. This is an open panel (repeated in all the larger bookcases) which contains a portion of the class catalogue. When these catalogic doors, so to speak, are closed, the carved panels resume their wonted appearance. This primitive arrangement for cataloguing is scarcely adequate to recording the titles of some 60,000 entries which the Library now contains, and therefore more modern means have had to be adopted for this purpose. It is satisfactory to learn that Dr. James, the distinguished Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum, is now engaged on the compilation of a catalogue of the manuscripts in this collection.

The gem of the Library is perhaps the 'Psalterium et Cantica,' a book of Celtic origin and written about the year 800. It contains curious drawings and illuminations, rude enough, but evidently executed with great pains and all sincerity, although Ruskin, in his 'The two paths' (edition 1878, p. 27), did not appreciate the artistic nature of these primitive designs. Hardly less interesting is a curious Psalter of about the 12th century. Written in three columns, it contains at the beginning two quaint drawings showing the contrast between sacred and profane music. By the kind and special permission of Mr. James Bass Mullinger, M.A., Lecturer and Librarian of St. John's College, we are enabled to reproduce for the first time these old-time drawings (p. 777). The preface to the book consists of the Epistles of St. Jerome and St. Augustine, with extracts from their works relating to the Psalms. It also gives the Vulgate; another reading which is that called Gallicum; and a third which differs from both, called Hebraeum. The Canticles are as follows:

- (1) Of David after slaying Goliath; (2) Of Isaiah;
- (3) Of Hezekiah; (4) Of Hannah; (5) Of Moses; (6) Of Abacuc; (7) Of Moses; (8) Benedicite, omnia Opera; (9) Magnificat; (10) Nunc dimittis; (11) Gloria in Excelsis; (12) Te Deum.

Then follow the three creeds, a Litany, and several prayers. Another interesting volume is a large Antiphonarium, circa 1500, which Evelyn refers to as 'a vast old song-book, or service.' This 'vast old song-book,' which has the five-line notation, is well bound in oak boards with massive brass bosses, and may be seen in the photograph standing under the bust by the second bookcase.

A MS. Book of Devotion of the 15th century is another treasure. The miniatures—which are extremely beautiful and surrounded by delicate borders composed of leaves and flowers—are thirteen in number and comprise the following subjects: The Annunciation; the Birth of Christ; Adoration of the Magi; David Praying; Death striking a man, the same man dead, and received by Angels who rescue him from devils; the Burial of the Dead; St. John the Baptist and St. George and the Dragon (in two initial letters); and Our Saviour judging the World. The book formerly belonged to the foundress of the College, Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII., and was given by her to Lady Shyrley, with the following inscription in Lady Margaret's autograph:

*My good Lady Shyrley pray for Me that gevythe you thys booke
And hertely pray you Modyr to the Kynge.*

While on the subject of kings we may refer to a volume of letters (preserved in the Library) addressed to Dean Barwick, a Fellow of St. John's, and subsequently Dean of St. Paul's (1661), which contains a financial document in the handwriting of Charles II., one which shows the 'merry monarch' in the capacity of a borrower of money. His I.O.U. reads:

I do acknowledge to have receaved the summe of one hundred pounds by the direction of Mr. B[arwick].
Brusselles, the first of April, 1660. CHARLES R.

One of the show cases contains the poems (printed) of William Wordsworth, one of the most distinguished of Johnians, in which he has written:

are presented by the author as a testimony, though inadequate, of his respect and gratitude.

The MS. volume known as Henry VIII.'s Mass Book contains anthems and compositions of that period. Dr. Fayrfax is among the composers, and one mass—'God save King Herry'—was supposed to have been by the King himself, but Thomas Aschwell is its author. Another regally-associated volume is the copy of the 'Institutio Principis' of Erasmus, which formerly belonged to the youthful King Edward VI., the lutenist and astronomer, who wrote upon it in a scratchy, and not altogether legible hand, the following mis-spelled information:

The Prince this did wright when hee went to schole.

Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES may be specially interested in knowing that the Library possesses at least one volume which formerly belonged to William Byrd. The book, by Richard Crompton, the 16th century lawyer, is entitled 'L'authoritie et Jurisdiction des Courts de la Majestie de la Roygne' (London, 1594), and on its title-page the great English composer has legibly written his name, 'Wm. Byrde.'

The large collection of Bibles includes a very precious specimen of the Scriptures, of which only two copies in this state were made—one for

King Henry VIII., the other for Thomas Cromwell. Its title reads :

THE BYBLE IN ENGLYSHE, that is to save the content of all the holy scripture, bothe of ye olde and newe testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greeke textes, by . . . dyuerse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges. 1539. Fol. (Printed partly in London, partly in Paris.)

This is the first edition of the 'Great Bible,' so called from its size, and from the fact that it is referred to in the Injunctions issued to the clergy by Thomas Cromwell in 1538, as 'the hole byble of the largest volume,' and one that was ordered to be 'set up in sum conuenient place wythin the said church that ye have cure of, whereas your parishoners may most comodiously resorte to the same and reade it.' The copy in St. John's College Library was specially prepared for Thomas Cromwell. It is not only 'a large, noble, and spotless copy,' but may be considered the finest book on vellum that exists ; moreover it is possible that the sumptuous illuminations which enrich its sacred pages are the work of Holbein. The Library is rich in early printed classics, and contains specimens of those typographical excellencies associated with the names of Caxton, Wynkyn de Worde and Richard Pynson. In this connection it should be remembered that Lady Margaret, the Foundress of the College, was the patroness of Caxton, our first printer, and that his successor, Wynkyn de Worde, styles himself 'Her Printer.' A copy of 'Polychronicon,' printed by Caxton, at Westminster, in 1482, bears this quaint inscription :

Tho. Baker, Col. Jo. Socius ejectus. So scarce and dear that it cost me what I am ashamed to own.

Thomas Baker (1656-1740), nonjuror and antiquary, left in manuscript a very complete and accurate history of Cambridge, with other antiquarian writings.

From buildings and books we may now turn to some of the most distinguished Johnnians whose names are writ large in the roll of fame. The poets, as being closely associated with music, may first claim our attention, beginning with Ben Jonson, the friend and contemporary of Shakespeare. And who does not know Robert Herrick through his charming lyrics 'To Anthea' and 'Cherry Ripe'? But are our readers familiar with the features of the poet? Those who return a negative reply may be glad to have a presentment of him, reproduced from the frontispiece to his 'Hesperides' issued in 1648. This, one of the sunniest books in English literature, contains the two songs above-mentioned—'To Anthea, who may command him anything,' and 'Cherry Ripe.' Herrick—or, as he signs himself, 'Hearick'—entered St. John's College in 1613. He was allowed £10 a term for his expenses there, a sum which he deemed insufficient for his needs, whereupon he wrote to his uncle and guardian :

I could wish chardges had leaden wings and Tortice feet to come vpon me.

On another occasion he referred to the fact that his monetary anxieties caused him to neglect his studies, and then went on to say :

If you would be pleased to furnish me with so much, that I might keepe beforehand with my Tutor, I doubt not that with quicke dispatch to attaine to what I ayme.

Another letter he sarcastically addresses to his 'most carefull Vncle'; and in one epistle he speaks of his impecuniosity as his 'playne song.'

The list of Johnnian poets includes the names of Edward Benlowes, the eccentric author of 'Theophila ; or Love's Sacrifice' (1652) ; Matthew Prior, a fellow of the College ; William Mason, the friend of the poet Thomas Gray, and also an essay writer on music, and the composer of the familiar anthem 'Lord, of all power and might' ; and Charles Churchill, famous for his 'Rosciad.' Coming to later times we find the names of Henry Kirke White and William Wordsworth. As the great Lake-poet says in 'The Prelude,' speaking of his undergraduate days :

The Evangelist Saint John my patron was :
Three Gothic courts are his, and in the first
Was my abiding-place, a nook obscure ;
Right underneath, the College kitchens made
A humming sound, less tuneable than bees,
But hardly less industrious ; with shrill notes
Of sharp command and scolding intermixed.

A contrast between Sacred and Profane Music.

FROM A PSALTER OF THE 12TH CENTURY, IN THE LIBRARY OF ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

(Photographed, for the first time, by kind permission of the Librarian, Mr. James Bass Mullinger, specially for this article by Mr. W. Tams, St. John's Lodge, Cambridge.)

Among divines, St. John's can claim Rowland Hill—the witty preacher, who gave thanks for the letter H in our language, as without it he would always have been ill; the saintly Henry Martyn, a senior wrangler, and Bishop Selwyn, both zealous in the cause of foreign missions; and Bishop Colenso, whose name is associated in not a few minds with algebra and arithmetic. Philanthropists are well represented by William Wilberforce; statesmen by Lord Palmerston; and men of science by two great astronomers, Sir J. F. W. Herschell, and John Couch Adams, the discoverer of Neptune, both of them Senior Wranglers. Truly a distinguished company. A note, preserved in the Library, made by John Couch Adams (1819—1892) while an undergraduate, is too interesting not to be quoted:

1841, July 3. Formed a design, in the beginning of this week, of investigating, as soon as possible after taking my degree, the irregularities in the motion of Uranus, wh. are yet unaccounted for; in order to find whether they may be attributed to the action of an undiscovered planet beyond it; and if possible thence to determine the elements of its orbit, etc., approximately, wh. wd. probably lead to its discovery.

The music of the College has next to be considered. In the statutes of 1530 one of the functions of the two deans was the 'compelling of members of the College to practise in the choir.'

How far this statute has been carried out during the past four hundred years it would be futile to inquire. Suffice it to say that at the present time the College orchestra consists of some sixteen players on stringed instruments, and that the last May concert was given unaided by outside help. A Bach Mass has been performed in the College Chapel, and the same composer's Trauer music is to be given next term. The choristers are town boys—fourteen in number, in addition to six probationers—who are educated at a choir school close to the College precincts. Half the amount of their emoluments is held in reserve and allowed to accumulate till the time each boy leaves. The adult section of the choir consists of four lay-clerks (two altos, one tenor, and one bass) in addition to five choral scholars (three tenors and two basses), each of whom receives a salary of £40 a year.

On alternate Saturdays the evening service in Chapel is sung unaccompanied, when the excellent ensemble of the choir has its full opportunity. A rendering of Samuel Wesley's fine eight-part motet 'In exitu Israel'—sung on the occasion of our visit at the Sunday evening service—is a composition that puts any choir to the test, but the St. John's singers heroically grappled with its difficulties. The reverent and expressive rendering of the Psalms, and the devotional singing of the Responses were commendable features of the service, as were the restrained organ accompaniments of Mr. Rootham, the organist and choirmaster.

The Chapel, which forms so prominent a feature of the collegiate buildings, may now be referred to, by reason of its close connection with the musical history of the College. The present stately sanctuary, which occupies a site to the north of the original chapel, was designed by the late Sir Gilbert Scott and consecrated May 12, 1869. Although essentially a modern edifice it is built (of Ancaster stone) in a style prevalent in England about the year 1280, and of the Hospital which preceded the College. The total length of the Chapel—including the transeptal ante-chapel—is 204 feet; in width it is 34 feet, except the ante-chapel, which is 75 feet broad. The massive tower, from which a splendid view of Cambridge and its surroundings can be obtained, is 140 feet in height. The high-pitched roof of the choir is vaulted in oak and decorated by full-length figures illustrating the eighteen centuries of the Christian era. The stained glass windows are by Messrs. Clayton and Bell; the west window represents the Last Judgment, while the windows in the choir include Scriptural scenes in which St. John participated. The organ occupies a chamber, erected on the north side, 32 feet wide, 14 feet deep, and 46 feet high; and as this abiding place of the organ is so roomy and lofty, and the main building acoustically perfect for music, the position of the instrument is a most effective one. Before, however, giving the specification of the present organ, something may be said about the former instruments in the Chapel.

The earliest mention of an organ in the College records is in a list of Benefactions drawn up in 1528, wherein is stated that :

Sondry and diuers marchauntes in London gave amongst theyme X li [£10] towards the byeing of the newest Orgaynes.

The Audit Book of the year 1557-8 contains this disbursement :

Item for makynge a lecterne for ye orgaines in the quere iijs.

In the year 1634, a new instrument was considered necessary, therefore an organ builder of high repute—to wit, Robert Dallam, 'of the City of Westminster, Organ maker'—was entrusted with the erection of a new organ.* The Articles and Covenantes of Agreement between the 'Master of the Colledge of St. John the Evangeliste, in the Vniuersity of Cambridge, the ffellowes and Schollers of the same Colledge' and Robert Dallam, is a legally worded document too long to quote in full; but it is therein stated that Mr. Dallam agreed to make and finish one payre of organs, or Instrumentes, to conteyne six seuerall stoppes of pipes, euery stoppe conteynynge fortynine pipes, (viz.) one diapason most part to stand in sight, one Principall of Tynne, one Recorder of Wood, one small Principall of Tynne, one two and twentieth of Tynne, with Sound boords, Conveyances, Conducts, Roller boord, Carriages and Keyes, two bellowses and wind trunks, with the case and carving onely, with all other necessities therevnto belonging, finding all manner of stuffe, both of yron, brasse, tynne, timber and wainscoate incident to the making and finishinge of the said Instrument.

The sum to be paid for this 'payre of organs, or Instrumentes' was 'nine score and five poundes of lawfull money of England in manner and forme following (viz.) fflower score poundes at the sealing and deliuey of these presents and fforty poundes more at the deliuey of the materialls belonging to the said Instrument,' and so on. But the Master and others had in addition to 'beare and defray the charges of Carriage of these Organs and materialls thereof from the Citty of Westminster to St. John's Colledge, and all tooles incident therevnto, and of Recarriage of the same from thence backe again to Westminster.' In order to raise the money for the payment of this new organ—£185, a large sum for an instrument in those days—it was proposed to sell twenty-two pieces of plate, 'growne old and vselesse,' of which the following are examples :

Mr. Tho. Gorney's beaker	...	"	10	"
Mr. Jerrard Dyose his bowl	...	"	8	"

* Strangely enough, in all the biographical notices of the various Dallams, no mention is made of Robert Dallam having erected the organ in St. John's College, Cambridge; he also provided one for Jesus College, Cambridge, about the same time, 1635.

Although the silver was sold—215 $\frac{3}{4}$ oz. at iijs xjd. the ounce—in London, the proceeds were not devoted to the payment of Mr. Dallam's bill, as that was discharged by 'Mr. Boothe's money' in the form of a legacy from that gentleman, a senior Dean of the College. We learn that the carpentry work about 'the organ-loft and stairs to it' was

At the Restoration Dr. Peter Gunning—the twenty-second Master of the College, afterwards Bishop of Ely, and author of the Collect for 'All sorts and conditions of men'—showed much interest in the music of the Chapel. He rebuilt the organ in the loft, or gallery, at the west end of the Chapel, and re-formed the choir. Moreover, he bequeathed a considerable sum of money 'for the better provision of more voices for the Quire, whereby God's service may be more solemnly performed and decently sung.' It appears that a seat was provided for the Master in the organ-loft, as the accounts of 1691-2 contain this entry:

For a Turkeywork Carpet for y^e Master Seat in y^e Organ Loft, vs.

In 1839 Messrs. Hill erected a new organ (incorporating some of the old work), and thirty years later built a still larger instrument for the new Chapel. The present organ is contained in a double

Two other disbursement entries, although of an earlier date, may be quoted:

The Puritan period left its mark in the accounts during the years 1642-44, e.g.:

The earliest reference to an organist of St. John's College is to be found on a monument in the New Building of Peterborough Cathedral, wherein were interred the remains of one 'Johannes Brimble,' who is described as 'Col. D. Johan: in Cant. Alumnus et Organista,' and who died July 25, 1670, aged 19. The inscription further states that Mr. Brimble was cœlestem evectus Academiam.

Musis et musicæ devotissimus Ad

The entrance-lists of the College show that 'John Brimble, co. Middlesex, son of Geoffrey Brimble; bred at Peterborough,' was admitted a sizar in 1668, aged 16. From this it would appear that in those early days the organ in the Chapel was played by an undergraduate, unless, indeed, John Brimble is an old-world instance of the modern organ-scholar not unknown at certain colleges.

In 1680 one Thomas Williams was organist: there is an anthem by him, a setting of 'Arise, arise,' in the Ely collection. It is not possible to give a complete list of the organists, even if that were necessary, as their names do not appear in the College books, although the patronymics of the bellows-blowers are therein given! Pluralities began with William Tireman in 1777, who also held the organistship of Trinity College. Subsequent organists include such well-known names as Dr. J. Clarke-Whitfield, William Beale (composer of the madrigal 'Come, let us join the roundelay'), Thomas Attwood Walmisley, Professor of Music in the University, and Alfred Bennett. In 1857, on the appointment of the late Dr. G. M. Garrett, the pluralities of former times ceased, and that skilful composer of church music held the organistship of St. John's for the long period of forty years. Upon the death of Dr. Garrett, in 1897, Dr. E. T. Sweeting (now of Winchester College) was appointed and he efficiently discharged the duties of the office for four years.

The present organist, Mr. Cyril Bradley Rootham, M.A., Mus.B., born at Bristol, October 5, 1875, is a son of Mr. Daniel Wilberforce Rootham, the much esteemed musician of the western city. Mr. Cyril Rootham owes not a little of his early training in music to his father, and to those delightful evenings of the Bristol Madrigal Society, so long and so ably conducted by Mr. Rootham, Senr. He studied the organ at Clifton College, under the late Mr. W. F. Trimmell, and counterpoint and harmony under Mr. Cedric Bucknall, of Clifton. For eleven years he was a pupil at the Bristol Grammar School, proceeding from there to St. John's College, Cambridge, taking his B.A. degree in 1897, that of Mus.B. in 1900, and M.A. in 1901. He took 2nd Class Honours in the Classical Tripos, having at the same time to discharge the duties of organist and choirmaster in his last year, owing to the failing health of Dr. Garrett. During his undergraduate career he rowed in several

Mr. Rootham then became a student of the Royal College of Music, where from 1897 to 1900 he studied under Sir Walter Parratt for organ and Sir Charles Stanford for composition. He held the post of organist and choirmaster of Christ Church, Hampstead, in succession to Dr. Walford Davies, from 1898 to 1901. In the latter year he obtained the organistship of St. Asaph Cathedral, a post he held for only six months,—‘six of the pleasantest months of my life,’—until he accepted the invitation to become organist of his old College three years ago. Mr. Rootham has strong inclinations towards creative achievement—‘composition is half my life,’ he says. His attainments in that direction include two String Quartets, Suite for orchestra, Suite for violin solo and orchestra, Ode for chorus and orchestra, ballad for baritone solo and orchestra, ‘Andromeda’ (a dramatic

FRANK DAMROSCH.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

Thirty years ago Charles Kingsley visited America. At San Francisco he was invited to Berkeley University, where he delivered an address to the students on ‘Culture.’ The President of the University thus describes and epitomises Kingsley’s words of wisdom:

‘His speech, so invigorating, yet so simple, will long be remembered—like a draught of pure water in a thirsty clime. The man was inspired, and felt every word that he spoke. . . . He urged the students also to cultivate the æsthetic faculty—a taste for music and the fine arts; to learn to appreciate grace and manners, and beauty of form, as studied by the Greeks, who produced the sculptors, painters, and musicians of old. He paid a special tribute to music. . . . Music was necessary to the rounding and finishing of the perfect character.’

This advice of the revered Canon, who was a philanthropist in the truest sense of the term, is applicable for all time and to all countries. It should serve as a stimulus to workers in the field of popular music, foremost among whom is the subject of this Biographical Sketch.

Franz Heino Damrosch—his first name after his godfather, Franz Liszt—was born at Breslau on June 22, 1859. He is the eldest son of Dr. Leopold Damrosch (1832-1885), a remarkable musician in many ways. A devoted classicalist and strenuous fighter for new ideas in music, Leopold Damrosch took an active part in the reform movement which had its origin at Weimar, where he held the position of solo violinist in the Grand Ducal orchestra. As a whole-hearted admirer and life-long friend of Wagner’s, he went ‘begging around’ for money in order to relieve the financial strain of the master during his exile at Zurich. He conducted the first performance of the Overture to ‘Tannhäuser’ at Breslau to the additional accompaniment of hisses, but with dauntless courage he persevered until these signs of disfavour were replaced by applause. After having done splendid work in Breslau for twelve years, Leopold Damrosch was appointed in 1871 conductor of the Arion Society of New York. He founded the Oratorio Society of New York in 1873, also the Symphony Society in 1878, and in various enterprises proved himself to be not only a pioneer but a man of mark, full of earnestness for the art he loved and practised with untiring energy. His second son, Mr. Walter Damrosch, who succeeded him in his conducting appointments at New York, worthily upholds the musical traditions of the family.

‘I was brought up in an atmosphere of music,’ Dr. Frank Damrosch tells us during his recent visit to London. ‘Liszt, Wagner, Tausig, Rubinstein—high priests of music—Joachim and other great musicians of the day were frequent visitors at our house in Breslau. As a boy, aged about five or six, I felt as proud as a peacock when I turned over the leaves of the quartet players who met under our roof. The idealist example set by my father instilled into me from my childhood a deep and abiding love of music in its highest and noblest forms. In America I studied under Pruckner, Jean Vogt, Von Inten, and Moszkowski, and my father gave me valuable hints in violin playing, especially bowing. A great event of my boyhood was the first visit to America of Hans von Bülow in the season of 1875-76. I attended all the rehearsals and concerts—the latter numbered 139—which he gave and in which my father co-operated. Von Bülow's performances of Bach and Beethoven were of the greatest educational value to me at this impressionable period of my life.'

Upon emerging from his teens Frank Damrosch, who was having 'a too easy time at home,' determined to go out West for a year and to earn a living without depending upon music for his daily bread. He went to Denver, Colorado, with forty dollars in his pocket. For six weeks he applied at shop after shop, office after office, for a job, but without success. It was a terribly dull season and the youth became very home-sick. At last he found employment in a hat store, his duties being to scrub the floor of that head-gear emporium and to brush the hats of the customers. During the absence of 'the boss' he sold hats, and his wages were increased from 60 to 75, then to 100 dollars per month. At the end of the year he began to feel quite independent, and he might have ended his days as a hatter!

But all this time he felt that he was not in his proper element. In spite of his struggles and the drudgery of his business occupations, the artistic instinct within him reasserted itself, and he felt that the whole bent of his nature craved a musical existence. He made the acquaintance of a lawyer who played a fiddle: a second violin and a viola were also available for the making of concerted music, but no violoncellist! One day he saw an old violoncello for sale in a shop; this he purchased, and worked hard with Kummer's 'Violoncello School' in order to make up a string quartet. The players met every Sunday morning and scraped away to their hearts' content. The next step in the musical uplift of Denver was a bold one. Young Damrosch, in the spirit of a true enthusiast, sent a letter to every church singer in Denver asking them to meet at a certain hall in the city on Tuesday evenings regularly to practise vocal music under his direction. These choralizings were not only most successful, but were greatly enjoyed. From a social point of view they more than fulfilled their purpose, and the seeds of the love of music among the people were being sown by the young conductor with gratifying success and hopeful results. Those vocal practisings—made up of any material the zealous young conductor could find, and financed by him for five years—developed into the Denver Chorus Club, a title which showed the social nature of the organization.

'We performed oratorios,' says Dr. Damrosch, 'to the accompaniment of organ and strings played by amateurs. On the afternoon of Washington's birthday (February 22, 1884) we decided to perform the "Creation." As the theatres were closed at that time of the day the bandsmen thereat were free from their duties. I therefore asked them to play at our concert and offered to pay them. They willingly agreed to come, but declined to accept any remuneration for their services. In fact it was a great enjoyment to them to exchange the horrible stuff they were in the habit of playing at the theatres for the genial strains of old Papa Haydn. The result of this venture was the formation of a private orchestral society which met every Sunday morning for the rehearsal of symphonies, &c.' It is not surprising to hear Dr. Damrosch say that this experience, as conductor of the orchestra, was invaluable to him. He rapidly made a name as a teacher of music. His services were in such demand that after four years of ups and downs in commerce, he gave up business and devoted himself entirely to music, except that he obtained a commission in the Militia, thus adding further variety to his experience of life.

The propagandist and educational spirit wherewith the nature of Frank Damrosch is so fully charged found a fresh and congenial outlet when he turned his attention to music for the children. 'We have no music in our schools,' the Superintendent of the Public Schools wrote to him in the spring of 1884: 'Will you not come and teach the children?'

He did, with the result that he was appointed Superintendent of Music in the Public Schools of Denver. This post greatly influenced his future career, inasmuch as it caused him to make a serious study of the then existing methods of teaching sight-singing to children. Thus in three branches of the art—choral, orchestral, and school-music—this enterprising lover of music in his early twenties proved to be a pioneer of the right stamp. A watch presented to him in 1884 by the Denver Chorus Club is one of his precious possessions as being a memento of those business and art-propagating days at Denver. The church appointments held by him at Denver were theologically varied: he was successively organist and choirmaster of the First Congregational Church, of the Synagogue, and of the Unitarian Church.

In the spring of 1885, on the death of his father, it was considered necessary that Frank Damrosch should return to New York to share with his brother Walter the responsibilities which Dr. Leopold Damrosch had left them. Great as was the sacrifice at that time of abandoning his work and position at Denver, in the end the change was of inestimable value to him. He accepted the post of chorus-master at the German Opera and retained it for six years until (in 1891) German opera in New York came, for the time being, to an end. Such free hours as were left to him were employed in teaching singing, pianoforte, and the theory of music, in conducting small choral societies, and instructing various classes in sight-singing. After the close of the German Opera he was elected conductor of the 'Musurgia,' a male-voice choral society; of the 'Choral Club,' a society of mixed voices; of the Oratorio Society of Bridgeport, Connecticut; of the Newark Harmonic Society; and he became organist to the Society of Ethical Culture. From these duties he retired after some years, as other more important work came to him.

An interesting period in the life of Frank Damrosch has now to be considered. In 1892 he organized the People's Singing Classes for the benefit of the working people in New York. He says: 'Among those who attended my classes in sight-singing were some wealthy ladies who assured me that the power they had acquired of singing from notes at sight was to them a greater source of pleasure than anything which money could buy. This knowledge fired me with the desire to spread the love and culture of good music among the people, to help them to make their own music and enjoy its uplifting influence. These classes are held three times a week in various parts of New York and its neighbourhood. The street is often black with people eager to enter the hall in which the class is held. That those who join attend seventy-five per cent. of the practisings is a sufficient proof that they like to come. The teachers give their services, each pupil pays a nominal fee of ten cents per lesson, music is provided free, and we have a balance of between five and six thousand dollars in the bank. In the first year we had an attendance of 700 pupils, now we number about 2,000 students a year.'

A neat little circular, published by the People's Choral Union of New York (at 41, University Place), may be quoted from in order to show the scope of this excellent organization and the scheme of its vast educational operations. The cover of the booklet asks a question—

The first three pages of the 'inside' contain the following information:

If you cannot sing by note, the People's Singing Classes will teach you to do so.

No previous knowledge of music is necessary, as you will be taught to read music at sight.

No trial of voice required.

The classes are open to every man over eighteen and every woman over sixteen years of age.

The only charges are the dues, ten cents each lesson, payable only for the lessons you attend. The music will be furnished free.

The teachers of these classes are personally selected by Mr. Frank Damrosch and are in close touch with him. Most of them have had several years' experience in the work of the People's Singing Classes.

The season comprises a course of about thirty lessons, once a week, from October until April.

Attendance at any of the elementary classes for two-thirds of the lessons entitles the members to admission to the advanced class and later to the chorus of the People's Choral Union, which is under the personal direction of Mr. Frank Damrosch.

The People's Singing Classes were founded by Mr. Frank Damrosch in 1892 to promote the love and culture of good music among men and women in a simple yet thorough way. They are under the management and supervision of the People's Choral Union, organized 1894, incorporated 1900.

The movement is a co-operative undertaking between teachers of music and the music-loving people, self-governing and self-sustaining. The members' dues pay all expenses, and no wealthy patronage is ever invoked. The services of all members, including the director and teachers, are given free.

In this connection mention must be made of a book entitled 'Popular Method of Sight-singing' from the pen of Dr. Frank Damrosch, founded on the 'movable doh' system.

Growing out of the People's Singing Classes—which meet in twenty different parts of New York—are the Advanced Classes, numbering about 1,000 men and women. This is now an incorporated society called the People's Choral Union, meeting under his personal direction every Sunday afternoon for the study of the masterpieces of oratorio. Like the Singing Classes, the People's Choral Union is entirely self-supporting, and the work Dr. Damrosch and his assistants are doing is far-reaching in its influence for good among the working people of the United States; moreover it is not surprising to learn that, through the influence and inspiration of the subject of this sketch, similar classes have been started in other cities, one of the most successful being at Toronto, Canada. The raison d'être of the People's Choral Union and of the People's Singing Classes in New York may be judged from the following Christmas greeting from the Director to his large family of singers:

To all members of the People's Choral Union and of the People's Singing Classes, Greeting:

Bound together in harmony by the music of the great tone-poets, uplifted by it to a realization of the best that is within us, and with the power we have gained through our song to bring beauty and sweetness into the lives of others—let us go forth joyfully to spread the message of ‘Peace on Earth, Good Will toward Men!’

FRANK DAMROSCH,
*Director People's Choral Union

The Musical Art Society is another New York organization which owes its origin to his eager enterprise. This consists of a chorus of sixty professional vocalists, all carefully selected for quality of voice and good musicianship, who sing a capella choruses of the old Italian and Flemish schools and of modern composers. ‘Each singer is paid twenty-five dollars a concert,’ Dr. Damrosch tells us, ‘this sum including attendance at as many rehearsals as I consider necessary, and each concert costs $4,000. The programmes are arranged in three divisions—Part I., the old school; Part II., an instrumental piece, concerto, &c., by way of relief; and Part III., some English madrigals, or something by Brahms or Cornelius. In Carnegie Hall, where the concerts are given, is a large end gallery, which is occupied by the members of the People's Choral Union to the number of 900. Not only do they have the educational advantage of hearing some of the best unaccompanied music beautifully and artistically performed, but they also, from that elevated position, take part in the concert.’ ‘How do you manage that?’ we ask. ‘Well, when we do a Bach church cantata the 900 sing the chorale, and I assure you the effect is quite beautiful as the voices singing those simple strains float down from the far-away distance. In the setting of the 134th Psalm by Jan Pieters Sweelinck, based upon the Old 100th tune, the melody, sung ppp, greatly moved the audience and us on the platform with its beauty and grandeur as sung by those artistically-minded working people. It carried us four hundred years back, and I was immensely gratified when the occupants of the gallery said to me—referring to the whole Psalm—“Could not we sing that?”’

The following is a typical programme of a concert given by the Musical Art Society of New York, the tastefully got-up book of words, with a frontispiece portrait of J. P. Sweelinck, having the advantage of notes and translations by Mr. H. E. Krehbiel :

Yet another artistic iron in the fire has to be placed to the credit of Dr. Damrosch's industry and organizing faculties. Seven years ago he was appointed Supervisor (director) of singing in the Public Schools of New York. This post at once gave him 300,000 juvenile pupils exclusive of 7,000 school teachers! In this he has the help of twenty-six assistants who work different districts, each teacher giving a class-singing lesson of ten to fifteen minutes every day in the various schools of the city. At the age of six each child joins the singing-class, and by the time he (or she) is fourteen, three-part songs are performed at sight. In addition to sight-singing (from the staff notation), voice culture is taught, and the artistic rendering of songs, their poetic import, &c., are dwelt upon and encouraged in every way. Who can estimate the influence of such work on the musical taste of the rising generation?

Again : six years ago he organized the Symphony Concerts for Young People, which he conducts. These educational music-makings are held in Carnegie Hall on six Saturday afternoons during the season. They pay their way, nearly the whole house being subscribed for at the commencement of the season, though generous-hearted Mr. Carnegie is quite prepared to meet any deficit. 'The seats upstairs are very cheap,' says Dr. Damrosch, 'and are occupied by teachers and pupils from the elementary schools to the number of 1,500. The programmes are short—not more than three or four numbers. I give a short explanation of the Symphony, &c., about to be played—an analysis of its form, illustrated by excerpts played by the orchestra, and then we play the work right through.' There is a good deal of elasticity in the term Young as regards the people who attend these delightful concerts, as their ages range from six to sixty ; but the three-scorers who greatly enjoy those full-scores are young in spirit in spite of their grey hairs. And why not, under the rejuvenating influences of music? In concluding this interesting feature of Dr. Damrosch's musical life we give an outline of one season's programmes :

Accompanying the above 'outline' is a statement which gives the 'why and the wherefore' of the Symphony Concerts for Young People. It reads thus :

The name of these Concerts indicates the idea which four years ago prompted their establishment, but it also suggests a limitation which does not really exist. In the pursuit of the original intention, a far wider range of usefulness at once revealed itself. Many truly musical persons find in the usual Orchestral Concert a labyrinth of bewildering beauties, in which they too often lose the path. Of these 'older' people, many have become faithful attendants at the Concerts, enjoying with the 'young' people, whose taste must be directed, the charm and variety of the programmes.

In the brief explanations which precede the orchestral numbers, Mr. Damrosch aims primarily, by the exposition of the separate themes and of their weaving together, to teach the ear to listen to the details while the mind grasps the unity of the composition. He seeks further, by declaring the meaning of the themes and by bringing out the emotional qualities of melody and treatment, to show how deep and broad is the significance of true music, desiring so to fix it upon the memory that its value shall transcend the mere enjoyment or excitement of the moment.

That young people appreciate these Concerts is abundantly attested in the frank and intelligent comments and lively discussions frequently overheard.

That teachers have found them full of helpful suggestions has been many times gratefully acknowledged.

That older people thoroughly enjoy them may be seen in every audience, many responding to the beauties of the programme and others doubtless echoing the regret expressed by a subscriber that these things had not been explained to him in his youth, so that he might always have heard with two ears instead of one. To hear not only with both ears, but with the understanding, these are questions of gradual training and culture, by which we may finally come to know the inward sense as well as the outward beauty of music.

Not the least important of Dr. Damrosch's multifarious musical duties is the conductorship of the Oratorio Society of New York, a post he has worthily held since 1898. This, the oldest and most important choral organization in New York, was founded by Dr. Leopold Damrosch in 1873; Mr. Carnegie is the President. With an enterprise characteristic of its conductor, this Society gave the first performance in America of Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Apostles,' an event which took place on March 24, 1904, in the Carnegie Music Hall. Dr. Damrosch conducts two societies in Philadelphia—the Orpheus Club (60 male voices) and the Eurydice Society (120 ladies' voices), both these appointments dating from 1897. He has recently accepted the leadership of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, an organization of male singers which is one of the oldest and best in the country.

At present Dr. Damrosch is doing preparatory work for the organization of a new school of music in New York for which large endowments have been secured. In regard to this important venture, he says: 'The School of Musical Art will aim to give to all students a broad and thorough musical education. No student will be permitted to study only one branch of the art, but will be required to pursue a prescribed course, which will include all the subjects necessary to a good all-round education in music. The best teachers—to be secured in Europe and America—will comprise the Faculty, and the school will aim only for the highest artistic ideals.'

Finally, Dr. Frank Damrosch is an artist-minded musician of relentless energy. 'Picking up,' hard work, thoroughness, philanthropic aims and organizing zeal, seasoned with a genial temperament and commendable modesty, are qualities that have combined to make him a man of mark and one to be esteemed for his own and for his work's sake. In June last Yale University conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music. The general satisfaction resulting upon this unsought distinction cannot be better summarized or expressed than in the following extract from the New York Sun, a quotation which may fitly close this biographical sketch:

'Yale University did a graceful and appropriate act in conferring the degree of Doctor of Music on FRANK DAMROSCH, supervisor of music in the public schools in this city. No other man has done as much as Mr. DAMROSCH for the spread of musical taste and intelligence in New York. His Saturday afternoon concerts, with explanatory lectures, and his singing classes for the people have brought many thousands into close communion with great and refining works of art. And withal Mr. DAMROSCH is so modest that honor has to seek him, for he has never courted notoriety.'

Occasional Notes.

The shepherds on the lawn,
Or ere the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they than
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below:
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet
As never was by mortal finger strook,
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took:
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

Nature, that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat the Airy region thrilling,
Now was almost won
To think her part was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling:
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all Heaven and Earth in happier union.

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light,
That with long beams the shamefaced Night arrayed;
The helmèd cherubim
And sworded seraphim
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn quire,
With unexpressive notes, to Heaven's new-born Heir.

Such music (as 'tis said)
Before was never made,
But when of old the Sons of Morning sung,
While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balanced World on hinges hung,
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres!
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the bass of heaven's deep organ blow;
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

JOHN MILTON.

From the Hymn On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, written in 1629.

Two musical men have been elected mayors of their respective cities—Councillor T. W. Taphouse, M.A., to the Mayoralty of Oxford, and Mr. Daniel Harrison to the Mayoralty of Lichfield. The former—concerning whom we gave an illustrated article in our October issue—is a well-known figure in musical circles, while the latter has been one of the Vicars-Choral of Lichfield Cathedral since 1878. This is not the first time that a Vicar-Choral of Lichfield has held a municipal office in the city, as in 1570 and in 1575 one John Walktate was junior Bailiff, and again in 1590, when Queen Elizabeth visited Lichfield, this worthy singing-man was elected Senior Bailiff, whose office at that time was equal to that of chief magistrate. Congratulations to the two musical Mayors of Oxford and Lichfield.

The issue of the letter M portion of the 'New English Dictionary' excites curiosity as to the references therein to the word Madrigal. The editor of this section, Mr. Henry Bradley, has to admit that the origin of the word is obscure. He traces it to the Italian word mandria, a herd, and the Latin mandra, a fold, hence a madrigal is a pastoral song. The Dictionary gives the year 1588 as the earliest use of the word, and that in a title-page:

Mvsica Transalpina. Madrigales translated of foure, five, and sixe parts, chosen out of diuers excellent Authors, with the first & second part of La Verginella, made by Maister Byrd, vpon two Stanz's of Ariosto, and brought to speake English with the rest. Published by N. Yonge, in fauour of such as take pleasure in Musick of voices.

Imprinted at London by Thomas East, the assignè of William Byrd, 1588. Cum Priuilegio Regiæ Maiestatis.

The next reference is to Thomas Nashe's 'Christ's Teares over Jerusalem' (1593), the extract being: 'Their merry-running Madrigals, and sportiue Base-bidding Roundelayes.' Passing over the familiar works of Morley, we come to Milton, who, in his 'Areopagitica: a speech for the liberty of unlicensed printing' (1644), asks: 'Who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers?' The references to Playford, in his 'Skill of Musick' (1674), and Burney, in his 'History of Music' (1789), need not be quoted as they are quite familiar.

For an early instance of the use of the word Madrigal as a song, or ditty, Mr. Bradley quotes Robert Greene who, in his 'Menaphon' (1589) says: 'If a wrinkle appeare in her brow, then our shepherd must put on his working day face, and frame nought but dolefull Madrigalls of sorrowe.' Christopher Marlowe (1593) is next mentioned in his charming poem 'The passionate Shepherd to his love,' which begins:

Come live with me, and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove,
That hill and valley, dale and field
And all the craggy mountains yield.

There will we sit upon the rocks,
And see the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And if these pleasures may thee move
Then live with me and be my love.

Students of Shakespeare will remember that some of these lines have found their way into 'The Merry Wives of Windsor,' and has not Sterndale Bennett most delightfully set them for four voices? Milton must again be quoted. In his 'Comus' (1634) the Elder Brother says, addressing Thyrsis:

Thyrsis! whose artful strains have oft delayed
The huddling brook to hear his madrigal
And sweetened every musk-rose of the dale.
How camest thou here, good swain?

If the 'New English Dictionary' does not throw any fresh light on the origin of the word Madrigal, it certainly furnishes no misleading information on the subject as does a popular Encyclopædia. In that work, after setting forth a brief history of the madrigal, the writer of the article refers his readers to a book—presumably one of reference—published in America, a tiny tome which proves to be a collection of poems called 'Madrigals'!

The following is from an auctioneer's catalogue:

As a sequel to the article on Norwich Cathedral in the November issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES the following additional notes may not be without interest. The epitaph on the monument of Richard Ayleward a 17th century organist, is thus given in Sir Thomas Browne's 'Repertorium' (1712 edition):

Here lyeth interred the Body of Richard Aleward, Organist of this Place, who was born at Winchester, And died here the 15th of October, An. Dom. 1669. In the 43rd Year of his Age.

Here lies a perfect Harmonie
Of Faith and Truth and Loyaltie;
And whatsoever Vertues can
Be reckon'd up, was in this Man.
His sacred Ashes here abide,
Who in God's Service liv'd and died.
But now, by Death, advanced higher,
To serve in the Celestial Quire.

God save the King.

Carrying on the Jenny Lind traditions of hospital benevolence, Madame Albani, Mr. Santley, and Mr. William Green, the local orchestra and chorus gave their services (as did Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, who conducted) at a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' given in the Nave of Norwich Cathedral on January 9, 1902. This music-making, organized by the Dean, resulted in the sum of £1,000 towards the endowment fund of the new Jenny Lind Hospital. Reference was made to the long term of office, fifty years, enjoyed by Osbert Parsley, a distinguished 'singing-man' of the 16th century, mentioned by Thomas Morley. At the present time the senior lay-clerk, Mr. Henry Thouless, has raised his voice in the Cathedral for more than half-a-century, first as a chorister under Dr. Buck, and subsequently as a tenor singer; moreover Mr. Thouless is a tenor in another sense, in that he plays the viola in the orchestra of the Norwich Philharmonic Society. Dr. Mann says that the old name of Pull's Ferry, Norwich—which he thinks should be called Bull's Ferry—is Sandling's Ferry, called after a former lay-clerk who sang with Osbert Parsley in the choir of Norwich Cathedral.

At a recent banquet of the Musicians' Company, Mr. W. J. Galloway, M.P., stated that he had had an interview with the Prime Minister, and that he thought he was justified in saying that the grievous injury due to the operations of the pirate music-sellers would be removed in the next Session of Parliament. Mr. W. P. Fuller, Mr. Arthur F. Hill, and Mr. Alfred H. Littleton have been elected to serve on the Court of Assistants of the Company.

It is said that nothing is improved by translation—except Bishops. Before us is a booklet of Press notices of a young violinist who has recently visited this country. From this document we learn—as set forth in English translations from foreign journals—that 'he (the artist in question) thinks with Beethoven, prays with Schubert, and sings with Mendelssohn.' Again: 'his violin sang as if it were seized by a profound passion, which, unable to utter a word, only knows awe and terror.' All this may be taken to imply that the young man is above reproach, and that he is not a pagan ninny.

The San Carlo Opera Company's successful six weeks' season, which was announced to close on Saturday, November 26, has been principally devoted to Italian operas. The performances of 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' and 'Lohengrin' were only moderately good; it was, as one would naturally expect, in works by Italian composers that the company achieved marked and well-deserved success. To the operas mentioned last month (p. 716) we may add Verdi's delightful opera 'Un Ballo in Maschera,' Puccini's 'La Bohème,' Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' Leoncavallo's 'Pagliacci,' and during the last week Verdi's 'Otello.' There were many excellent artists in the company, but Madame Giachetti proved herself to be specially gifted. Signor Caruso and M. Maurel added to the brilliancy of the season; neither of them however was an actual member of the San Carlo Company. We must not omit to mention the conducting of Signor Campanini. An important event of the season was the production on November 8 of Signor Cilèa's Opera 'Adriana Lecouvreur,' based on Scribe and Legouvé's clever and well-known play 'Adrienne Lecouvreur,' the title-rôle of which is specially associated with Madame Sarah Bernhardt. A good play when turned into an opera-book is seldom satisfactory, and although there are effective scenes in the one in question, the intrigues developed with rare skill by the French playwrights have had to be so condensed as to be almost unintelligible to anyone unacquainted with the original. As to the composer's music it is fresh, clever, and genial. The opera, produced at Milan only two years ago, has already been performed in many cities in Italy and elsewhere. It has been given here four times and was received with marked favour; but whatever its future destiny, it has brought the composer—who, by-the-way, is a professor of harmony at the Florence Conservatorio—into prominent notice. Signor Cilèa was present at the first performance of his work in England, when he received a specially enthusiastic welcome.

Mr. Robert Buckley, of Birmingham, writes:

From the first hearing of the violin solo in the Tenth Variation of the theme in Tschaikovsky's Third Suite I have been conscious of a strange familiarity for which I could never account.

A few days ago, however, I came across the following air, one of a number taken down by me before 1861—most likely about 1858 or 1859—from the singing of villagers in a remote parish to which modern civilization has hardly reached even now:

TSCHAIKOVSKY'S AIR.

OLD ENGLISH AIR: 'As I went walking through the meads.'

Having regard to the celebrity of the Russian composer, the coincidence may be considered worthy of notice.

The concerts of Old Chamber Music given by Miss Grace Sunderland and Mr. Frank Thistleton are distinctly interesting by reason of the out-of-the-way nature of their programmes. At the concert given (at Broadwood's) on November 22, No. 4 in the programme read thus:

- Trio: L'Apothéose de Corelli, for Two Violins and Piano François Couperin
(First Performance in England.) (1668-1733)
1. Grave.—Corelli, at the foot of Parnassus, begs the Muses to receive him.
 2. Allegro.—Corelli, charmed with his kind reception on Parnassus, gives expression to his joy! He goes on with his companions.
 3. Moderato.—Corelli drinks of the Fountain of Hippocrene: his companions go on.
 4. Vivace.—The enthusiasm of Corelli caused by the water of Hippocrene.
 5. Molto Moderato.—Corelli sleeps after his enthusiasm: his companions play the following Lullaby very softly.
 6. Vivace.—The Muses awaken Corelli and place him by the side of Apollo.
 7. Allegro ma non troppo.—Corelli expresses his thanks.
- First Violin—Mr. FRANK THISTLETON.
Second Violin—Mr. ROYSTON CAMBRIDGE.
Piano—Miss GRACE SUNDERLAND.

This quaint specimen of programme music is entitled—in its original publication—'Les Goûts réunis, ou nouveaux concerts, augmentés d'une Sonade en Trio, intitulée: Le Parnasse ou l'apothéose de Corelli' (1724). In scope and naïveté this programme-work of the French composer may claim a certain affinity with the Bible Sonatas of Johann Kuhnau, as described by Mr. J. S. Shedlock in his informing book 'The Pianoforte Sonata,' and in the compositions themselves as edited by Mr. Shedlock.

St. Cecilia's Day was most pleasantly celebrated by a dinner, at De Keyser's Hotel, given by the Livery Club of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. Not the least enjoyable feature of the occasion was the delightful selection of Cecilian music, admirably arranged by the Treasurer of the Club, Mr. Arthur F. Hill. The daintily got-up programme was in perfect taste and the music most admirably performed.

The Lincoln Triennial Festival is announced to be held on June 28 and 29, 1905, when the following works will be performed in the Cathedral: Festival Te Deum (Dvorák), Voces Clamantium (Parry), Prelude and Angel's Farewell from 'The Dream of Gerontius' (Elgar) (conducted by the composer), Requiem (Brahms), Unfinished Symphony (Schubert), and 'Israel in Egypt' (Handel). At the orchestral concert will be performed Elgar's 'In the South' Overture and Cowen's 'A Phantasy of Life and Love' (both works conducted by their respective composers), Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Tschaikovsky's 'Caisse-Noisette,' in addition to Wagner's 'Rule, Britannia' Overture, its first Festival performance. The band and chorus will consist of over 500 performers, and Dr. G. J. Bennett, organist of the Cathedral, as heretofore, will conduct the Festival.

A VISIT TO KING'S LYNN.

WITH NEW BURNEYIANA AND ARNEIANA.

The seeker after invigorating sea breezes will find them in Norfolk. If perchance he should fix upon Hunstanton for his ozone sojourn, he may derive additional enjoyment from visits to Sandringham, Castle Rising, and King's Lynn. Some notes, with illustrations, on the first two of this trio of places will appear in due course; in the meantime those readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES who are unacquainted with King's Lynn may perhaps be glad to know something about that ancient seaport town and its musical associations.

In the reign of William Rufus, Herbert de Losinga, the first Bishop of Norwich, 1091-1119, founded the church of St. Margaret, dedicated in 1101. The place was originally called Lenne Episcopi (Bishop's Lynn), a name it retained until the reign of Henry VIII., when it was changed to King's Lynn, or Lynn Regis. The Great Eastern Railway Company and some books of reference have shorn the town of its regal prefix, but the post-office authorities have not countenanced this decapitation. In 1204 King John granted a charter to the borough, which, in the reign of Edward I., was one of the principal ports of the Kingdom. Among the many treasures preserved in the strong-room of the Guildhall is that great pride of the town, King John's cup, misnamed, but probably dated 1380. Made of silver-gilt, its enamels are very fine, and it should be seen rather than described. There is also the 'Red Register of Lynn' (1310), an early paper book, and the Hall books (the Corporation records), perfect from 1423. The Guildhall, formerly the Hall of the Trinity Guild, built in 1410, contains a fine Gothic window and a Renaissance porch of flint and stone.

Outside the town and situated amidst pleasant surroundings is the small octagonal building of red brick called the 'Red Mount.' It stands on a green mound called Guanock Hill, and its walls enclose a perfect gem of 15th century architecture—a church in miniature, having nave, transepts and choir vaulted in stone of exquisite design. To quote from Mr. E. M. Beloe's excellent guide,* 'All the carved work is of the most tender and beautiful design and perfect execution.' This most interesting building of mediæval times has passed through various vicissitudes, but in 1828 it was put into its present condition by public subscription, and it is now under the care and protection of the Corporation. Grey Friars Tower, built of brick, and a kind of octagon rising on arches east and west, is all that is left of the Monastery of that name, while the South Gates of the town remain as an example of mediæval fortification. St. Nicholas Chapel (1410-1419), originally called 'pulcherrima Capella sancti Nicholai,' is a good specimen of Perpendicular work; its fine south porch is of remarkable beauty, other features of interest being the west window of eleven lights, the carving on the reading desks, the 15th century eagle, and the perfect roofs.

At the Grammar School Eugene Aram was at one time an usher. Here is an extract from the Corporation records relating to his appointment:

Tuesday, 14 February, 1758. Mr. Knox having informed this house by letter that he had dismissed John Birkes his late usher and had engaged Eugenius Aram in his stead, subject to their approbation, the said Eugenius Aram is approved of by this house during the pleasure and under the controul and power entirely of the said Mr. Knox. And it is ordered that the Usher's salary be paid to Mr. Knox during the pleasure of this house.

Another extract from the Corporation records is of special interest by reason of its connection with Dr. Charles Burney, who, it will be remembered, was organist of St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn, from 1752 to 1759:

Tuesday, 29 August, 1758.—Agreed and ordered by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council that a yearly salary of £20 be paid by the Mayor and Burgesses to Mr. Charles Burney, organist, as an encouragement for him to remain and teach musick in this Town, and that the salary commence from Michaelmas next and continue during the pleasure of this House.

This information—now for the first time made public—furnishes an instance of a municipality subsidizing an organist of a parish church in order to induce him to remain in the town as a teacher of music.*

Yet another Burney reference, resulting from the researches of the indefatigable Dr. A. H. Mann. The Norwich Mercury of September 11, 1757, contained the following advertisement, in which the name of the famous historian of music appears :

LYNN REGIS, Norfolk. On Tuesday the 11th of October there will be a performance of Sacred Musick in St. Margaret's Church, which will begin precisely at 3 o'clock in the afternoon; and in the evening there will be a Ball, at the Town Hall.

Tickets to be had at Mr. Burney's house in High Street.

No less interesting is a presumed connection between King's Lynn and the composer of 'Rule, Britannia,' discovered by Mr. Edward M. Beloe. It will be remembered that Dr. Burney was a pupil of Dr. Arne. What more natural therefore than that Arne should have visited Burney at King's Lynn during the latter's organistship at St. Margaret's Church? In the parish of Gaywood (an eastern suburb of King's Lynn) is 'Reffley Spring,' a chalybeate spring much frequented in a picnician sense. Now Arne wrote a short work entitled 'Reffley Spring: a cantata composed for the dedication of the water to the Deities of Love and Social Enjoyment.' The score of this cantata contains the information that 'Reffley Spring rises in a little Wood, about two miles from Lynn in the County of Norfolk.' There is no known record of the performance of 'Reffley Spring,' or of the author of the libretto of the cantata; but he may have written it to be performed at Reffley Spring, or at one of the Gardens then in vogue in London. At all events, the subject probably suggested itself to Dr. Arne during a visit he most likely paid to King's Lynn as the guest of his former pupil Charles Burney, then residing there.

King's Lynn can boast of its stately parish church of St. Margaret's, although the building has been considerably reduced from its original cathedral-like proportions. Cruciform in shape, in length 236 feet, width 80 (formerly 132) feet, this fine church contains specimens of Norman and Early English, also Decorated and Perpendicular styles of architecture. The twin western towers are massive in construction and one of them (the south tower) is hoary with age. Upon entering the church a very remarkable leaning of the northern tower at once arrests the attention of the visitor, but this is only perceptible from the interior, as when this tower was rebuilt externally—in 1452, at the cost of the Corporation—its perpendicular was righted on the outside. One of the towers was formerly surmounted by a spire; but it was blown down in 1741, and destroyed in its fall part of the nave, and in 1742 or 1743 the central lantern was wantonly removed. In 1745 the nave and aisles were rebuilt, and the Trinity

Chapel in the north aisle was pulled down in order to widen the street, this iconoclastic procedure having been allowed rather than that one or two houses should have been pulled down!

The connoisseur of brasses will find his heart's delight in this church, which contains two splendid specimens unrivalled for size or beauty of execution. One of these—measuring nearly 9 by 5 feet, the effigies nearly six feet high!—is of Robert Braunce and his pair of wives, Leticia and Margaret: A.D. 1364. In the lower part of this magnificent brass is depicted a peacock feast, a number of guests being seated at a table, while a servant is in the act of bringing in the dainty dish to the carver; meanwhile the attendant minstrels, standing at each end of the table, are making arches distant from the pulpit at the west part of the pillar or thereabouts.' No name is given of the builder of this organ, which was 'adorned with proper figures' and given by Thomas Thetford (the Mayor) and others. Was this the Dallam organ? If so, it must have been by George Dallam, the last-named of that well-known family of artists. In 1697 Christian Smith—referred to as 'of the parish of St. Giles in the fields, Westminster, organ-maker—repaired the organ at a cost of £45; he added a trumpet stop for £20 and agreed to tune the organ at a salary of 20s. per annum.

Soon after the appointment of Burney as organist of St. Margaret's (in 1752), the matter of a new organ engaged the attention of the Mayor and Corporation. A Minute—dated October 12, 1752—states that 'the organ erected in 1676 (which was then an old one removed from a college in Cambridge) is so much decayed in its several parts as to be rendered useless.' Assuming this was the Dallam organ, from which college in Cambridge did it come? It is not necessary to set forth in detail the loan methods whereby the Mayor and Corporation proposed to raise moneys for 'the new organ, new galling and finishing the church, paving with cobbles (there to this day) and enlightning the Saturday market,' &c.—suffice it to say that on September 14, 1753, it was agreed 'that the new organ now building by John Snetzler be directly sent from London by land, if the charge of land carriage thereof do not exceed three shillings per hundred.' Snetzler then lived in Oxford Road, now Oxford Street. In December Mr. Bidwell was paid the sum of £36 19s. for the carriage of the new organ, which weighed, with the cases, 164 cwt. 1 qr. The cost of the instrument (£700) was defrayed by the Corporation. Unfortunately no specification of this famous Snetzler organ is to be found in the records; but it contained the first dulciana stop, which, with other Snetzler stops, is retained in the present instrument.

One of Burney's predecessors in the organistship was Gabriel Barlow, a gentleman who in his will directed his wife 'to prosecute the executors of his mother-in-law for a silver tankard that Mrs. Sarah Tolls, his aunt, had left him by will.' To each of his brothers this angel-named organist bequeathed the sum of one shilling. The Corporation seem to have studied the comfort of the family of Dr. Burney in regard to their devotions, for they 'agreed that five stools be provided for the organist's family, to be placed in the organ loft at a charge not exceeding £3.'

The following is the specification of the present organ built by Messrs. Wordsworth and Co., Leeds, in 1895, and opened by Sir Walter Parratt:

Mr. Arthur Shirley, the present organist of St. Margaret's, fully maintains the musical traditions of the church, though naturally on more modern lines than those of the Burney days. The choir consists of twenty-two boys and about twenty men, the latter rendering voluntary aid. The services are fully choral, and after that on Sunday evening Mr. Shirley gives, with much acceptance, a short organ recital upon the fine instrument over which he so ably presides. On October 26 Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was sung in the church by the Festival choir (60 voices) organized by Mr. Shirley, who conducted the performance, the soloists being Miss Edith Luke, Miss Ada Phillips, Mr. G. H. Gregory (organist of Boston Parish Church), and Mr. Freeman E. Wright; Dr. A. H. Mann, organist of King's College, Cambridge, rendered invaluable assistance at the organ.

Acknowledgment of kind help rendered in the preparation of the foregoing notes on King's Lynn is due to Mr. E. M. Beloe, F.S.A., the historian of King's Lynn and a noted antiquary of the district; the Town Clerk, Mr. J. W. Woolstencroft; Mr. A. E. Rust, Parish Clerk of St. Margaret's; Mr. Arthur Shirley, organist and choirmaster; and for the use of photographs to Mr. Beloe aforesaid, and to Mr. Charles Smith, Junr., of King's Lynn.

A QUEEN OF SONG.

THE CENTENARY OF SCHRÖDER-DEVRIENT.

On December 6, 1804, at Hamburg, was born one of the greatest dramatic singers of the 19th century, one who personally knew Beethoven, Weber, and Wagner, and who impersonated important characters in the operas composed by those incomparable masters. Wilhelmine Schröder was cradled in music. Her father excelled as a baritone singer, while her mother achieved such fame as an actress as to merit being called 'die grosse Schröder' and the 'German Siddons.' Early trained by her mother to master attitude and gracefulness of movement, gesture, and delivery of speech, the girl had no trace of the débutante when in 1821, at the age of sixteen, she made a brilliant first appearance at the Vienna Opera House in 'Die Zauberflöte.' The freshness of her already well-developed soprano voice, the purity of her intonation, and certainty of attack made a great sensation. 'It was as if a singer had fallen from the clouds' was the verdict of those qualified to judge, and the opera-going public soon got to love her. One of her great parts was Agathe in 'Der Freischütz,' in which her splendid voice and charming appearance won great approval. Weber thus records in his diary, under date March 7, 1842, 'Conducted [at Vienna] "Der Freischütz" for Schröder's benefit. Greater enthusiasm there cannot be, and I tremble to think of the future, for it is scarcely possible to rise higher than this. To God alone the praise!'

But the great part in which Schröder-Devrient excelled all her contemporaries and those who came after her was that of Leonora in Beethoven's 'Fidelio.' In this she not only laid the foundations of her fame, but redeemed the opera from the indifference it had thereunto experienced. At her first impersonation of the heroine the young girl was honoured by the presence of the composer. On that occasion (in 1822) Beethoven, who sat behind the conductor, had wrapped himself so closely in the folds of his cloak that only his eyes could be seen flashing from it. At the close of the performance he smilingly patted her cheek, thanked her, and promised to write an opera for her—a promise, alas! he never fulfilled.

In 1832 the great singer came for the first time to London as the bright particular star of the German Opera Company. Chelard was the conductor—that is in the real sense of the term, and the occasion marked the permanent use of the baton in English performances at the opera and at concerts. The enterprise was disastrous, with one exception—the splendid achievement of Schröder-Devrient in 'Fidelio,' then quite new to English audiences. The performance—which took place at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, on May 18, 1832—drew forth the following criticism from the pen of H. F. Chorley, who said:

The intense musical vigour of Beethoven's opera was felt to be a startling variety, wrought out as it was in its principal part by a vocalist of a class entirely new to England. This was Madame Schröder-Devrient. Within the conditions of her own school she was a remarkable artist. . . . She was a pale woman; her face, a thoroughly German one, though plain, was pleasing, from the intensity of expression which her large features and deep tender eyes conveyed. She had profuse fair hair, the value of which she thoroughly understood, delighting, in moments of great emotion, to fling it loose with the wild vehemence of a Mænad. . . . Her voice was a strong soprano, not comparable in quality to some other German voices of its class . . . but with an inherent expressiveness of tone which made it more attractive on the stage than many a more faultless organ. . . . The tones were delivered without any care, save to give them due force. Her execution was bad and heavy. There was an air of strain and spasm throughout her performance.

The reason why Chorley failed to be greatly impressed with her voice per se, was doubtless because she gave way to such intense emotion, far in excess of her physical strength; in fact, in the days of her earliest appearances—ten years before she sang in London—she nearly lost her voice entirely through allowing her emotional feelings to have unrestrained freedom. In regard to this initial performance of 'Fidelio' in England, Moscheles records the following comic episode. 'In the deeply tragic scene where Schröder (Fidelio) has to give Haizinger (Florestan) a piece of bread which she has kept hidden for three days for him in the folds of her dress, he does not respond to the offer; she, in rather strong language, whispered to him: "Why don't you take it? Do you want it buttered?" All this time the audience, so intent on the pathetic situation, were entirely ignorant of the bread-and-butter by-play.'

She sang at several concerts, including the Philharmonic, during her sojourn in London, at one of which Mendelssohn accompanied her in Beethoven's 'Adelaide.' Moscheles, in his entertaining diary, records some interesting incidents of her visit. She often sang at his house, and when thanked for the pleasure she had given, would reply: 'It is a pleasure, children, to sing for you: here I can do as I like, but oh! the horror of a stiff English soirée, where the ladies stare at me, and quiz my behaviour.' Mrs. Moscheles records a dinner party—at which Haizinger, the leading tenor of the German Opera Company, and his wife were guests—in these words: 'We had too our great Schröder, and our still greater Mendelssohn. The conversation was naturally very animated, the two ladies were in such high spirits that they not only told anecdotes, but accompanied them with dramatic gesture. Schröder, when telling us "how he drew his sword," flourished her knife in a most threatening manner towards Haizinger, whereupon Mendelssohn whispered to me: "I wonder what John [the footman] thinks of such un-English vivacity? To see the brandishing of knives, and not to know what it is all about! Only think! . . ." We had the most beautiful music in the evening, one artist surpassing the other.'

Having referred to Weber and Beethoven in connection with this Queen of Song, we may now turn to Wagner, and not without justification, because Schröder created the parts of Adriano, Senta, and Venus in the operas respectively of 'Rienzi,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' and 'Tannhäuser.' It was in the summer of 1832, during a visit to Vienna, that Wagner first heard 'the very finest personatrix of the title-rôle (Fidelio),' to quote Mr. Ashton Ellis. Two years later, at Nuremberg, he was greatly struck with her Emmeline, one of her earliest juvenile rôles in Joseph Weigl's 'Schweizer Familie.' Mr. Ellis tells us: 'To his [Wagner's] intense surprise, it was this evening that first revealed to him the overwhelming grandeur of the woman: "That a thing like the impersonation of this Switzer maid cannot be turned into a monument for all futurity!" he exclaims nearly forty years later'; and readers of the master's 'Ueber Schauspieler und Sänger' (1872) cannot fail to be struck with the extraordinary influence which Schröder-Devrient exercised over him in regard to the development of his music-drama life-work. Writing in 1851, he said: 'The remotest contact with this extraordinary woman electrified me for many a year, even down to the present day, I saw, I heard, I felt her near to me, whenever the creative impulse seized me.'

'Rienzi' was first performed, at Dresden, on October 20, 1842, concerning the rehearsals of which an amusing story is related by Glasenapp. At one passage in the third act, on the Campo Vacchino, Adriano has to sit down 'brooding' on a broken column. In the middle of what ought to be a highly tragic situation, Schröder-Devrient suddenly called out to Wagner: 'Very well; but what am I to hatch?' a question which sent the whole band into roars of laughter. As Senta in 'The Flying Dutchman'—first performed January 2, 1843—she made a triumphant success. The Neue Zeitschrift (Schumann's paper) said:

In this rôle the Devrient surpassed herself in originality; the effect was extraordinary, the audience turned first hot, then cold, for intensity of emotion.

And here it may be stated that Schumann thought so highly of her powers that he dedicated to her his splendid cycle 'Dichterliebe,' from Heine's 'Buch der Lieder,' which takes rank among the finest of his songs. At the first performance of 'Tannhäuser'—at Dresden, on October 19, 1845—she created the part of Venus. The Scene in the Venusberg fell flat. 'You are a man of genius,' said Schröder-Devrient to Wagner, 'but you write such eccentric stuff, it is hardly possible to sing it.'

So far we have considered this Queen of Song as an opera vocalist of the highest excellence; but she was no less gifted as an interpreter of classical songs—the lieder of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann being those in which she specially excelled. In this connection two extracts from letters written by Mendelssohn may be given. Writing to his sister Fanny from Leipzig, on February 14, 1841, Mendelssohn says: 'The other day at our last historical concert (Beethoven), Herr Schmidt was suddenly taken ill, and could not sing of his "Ferne Geliebte" in the "Liederkreis." In the middle of the first part David said to me: "I see Madame Devrient is here." She had arrived that morning by rail and was to leave the next day. So during the interval, I went up to her, was vastly polite, and she agreed to sing "Adelaide," on which, an old pianoforte was carried into the orchestra from the ante-room. This was greeted with four rounds of applause, for people had an idea that Devrient was coming. And come she did, but in a shabby travelling costume, and Leipzig belled and shouted without end. She took off her bonnet before the audience, and pointed to her black pelisse, as if to apologize for it. I believe they are still applauding! She sang beautifully, and there was a grand flourish of trumpets in her honour, and the audience clapped their hands till the last bow of the shabby pelisse was out of sight.'

This genius-artist could not tolerate anything approaching an interpretation that is 'half-sponge, half-wood,' as she once designated a leading tenor; and did she not on one occasion as Romeo tickle the feet of a too unemotional Giulietta, during the caresses of the last scene in Bellini's opera? On the other hand, unrestrained feeling, word-painting, and other devices tending to super-realism, so to speak, may just overstep the border-line of that true art of which Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient was so distinguished an exponent. Her death took place at Leipzig on January 21, 1860, at the age of fifty-four. Her second name she acquired on her marriage with Karl Devrient.

Church and Organ Music.

A GENIUS-ORGANIST APOSTROPHISED.

Respectfully inscribed to Dr. S. S. Wesley.

Methinks all earth is banish'd from this place,
And we enspher'd in Heaven, while with closed eye
And soul entranced, I listen to the sounds
Heaven-born—th' embodiment of harmony,
Such as the orbs of light sing in their course—
Which, with magician's touch, thou call'st to life,
And waken'st from yon marvellous instrument,
O Son of Genius! whose majestic art
Commands the soul; now, soothing with thy soft
And winning melodies, in voice all calm,
All gentle as the singing of a child;
And now, as with a mighty thunder-peal,
Or the low booming of the autumn wind,
High-swelling till it stirs the tempest's wrath,
And fills all hearts with awe—awakening
The far-off echoes of the arched vault
Which canopies this Temple, higher then Ascending on the wings of praise sublime
To Heaven, in Glory to the Infinite.

Is there no Angel hovering near to list
The wond'rous harmony, and swell the song
With richer Glory ere it reach the Throne?
Who shall reproach the faith which dares to hope
That, as of old, to Saint Cecilia came
A white-robed listener, so when the voice
Of song and melody in praise ascends
Each morn and eve within this sacred fane,
They join it as of yore, and bear aloft
Man's feeble offerings? Close thine earthly eyes,
O doubting soul! and thou, perchance, mayst see
More than thy waking fancy dares to dream
Of heaven and heavenly ones. * * * * *

Hark! that burst of tone
Magnificent in sweetness, which resounds
From arch to arch, from choir to distant aisle,
Filling each corner of this beauteous fane
With a response of praise; with tuneless song
Bidding the voiceless stones repeat the strain
In full harmonious cadence, as a band
Of choristers with magic life endued.
And now—the momentary pause, so still,
So solemn in its silence; and the low
Soft wailing, like a feeble infant's cry,
Which thrills through every pulse; and then, the swell,
Rising like hope, till it bursts forth in joy
Of hope fulfilled. And now, note chasing note,
Running from high to low, from soft to loud,
Pedal and diapason, and shrill flute,
Clear-toned cromorn, and trumpet's thrilling blast,—
With ever-varying fulness, yet all sweet,
All beautiful, and pure as Angels' talk.

All hail! thou mighty soul-enthraling power
Of music, and ye glorious gifts of God,
The mind that moves, the finger that awakes
The swelling chord, and makes yon soulless pile
Instinct with life—the tongue to utter forth
The high and solemn thoughts of genius. Hail!
Thou spirit of munificence, whose love
For sacred song, and care to worship Him
In all the 'Beauty of holiness,' have raised Yon noble instrument of praise! But chief
To Him the Source of all, Whose love bestows
Such mighty gifts on man, to Him be laud
From heart and voice, and Organ's glorious tone!

W. W.

College Street, Winchester, Nov. 28, 1854.

The above poem (unearthed by Mr. John S. Bumpus) is by the late William Whiting (1825—1878), author of the familiar hymn 'Eternal Father, strong to save.' He was master of the Quiristers' School at Winchester College at the time that Samuel Sebastian Wesley was organist of the College and of the Cathedral. The poem is modestly headed 'Thoughts during the organ performance at Winchester Cathedral, on Tuesday, November 28, 1854,' that being the date on which Father Willis's organ was formally opened. An advertisement in the Hampshire Chronicle—wherein the poem originally appeared—of November 25, 1854, reads thus:

The Organ in Winchester Cathedral being now completed, its powers will be exhibited by Dr. S. S. Wesley, on Tuesday the 28th instant, from one to three o'clock. Admission to the Cathedral at a quarter before one o'clock, at the west door only.

To commence at one precisely.

The names of the pieces in the programme are not given in the newspaper account of the opening—can any of our readers supply them?—but the two hours' music included selections from the compositions of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Wesley, Handel, and Spohr, the last-named an especial favourite of Wesley's. The organ, by Father Willis, was 'about four-fifths' of that in the Great Exhibition of 1851, a magnificent instrument which made the name of the great organ-builder, and moreover gained him the order for the organ in St. George's Hall, Liverpool. The Winchester organ was first used (in an unfinished state) on June 3, 1854, one of the extra singers on that occasion being Master John Stainer, then a thirteen-year-old chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral.

THE NEW EDITION OF 'HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN.'

'Hymns Ancient and Modern' is a hymnal that has had so marked an effect on the worship-song of the people—not only in the Church of England, but in churches of other denominations—that a new edition of the book calls for special and detailed notice. Much might be said about the words and the poetry (where that exists) of this re-issue, but we must confine ourselves to a review of the music and matters relating thereto, adding, as a record for future reference, that the new edition was published on Thursday, November 3, 1904.

In our last issue (p. 720) we gave some historical notes on the original publication of the book, which made its first appearance at Advent, 1860; therefore it is somewhat of a shock to find it stated, on the back of the new title-page, that the first edition appeared in 1861, an extraordinary mistake to make. A first glance at the tunes shows one great change, the absence of expression marks. On the whole this is not so much to be regretted, as the system has had feeble imitators who have indulged in sentimental studies in word-painting, and not a few organists and choirmasters have been led to err in this respect, or want of respect to the dictates of common-sense. As in previous editions the verses of the hymns are not numbered, an omission that is put to the test in such a hymn as No. 628 ('The God of Abraham praise'), its ten verses being very closely printed.

One strong and highly commendable feature in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' has been the fixed-tune system; but it would seem as if the compilers of the revised book have more or less discarded that characteristic, as the words 'alternative tune' are appended to very nearly one-third of the tunes in this new book. The practical result of adopting any one of these alternatives is that a second copy must be used by those who wish to have the music before them. One may question the wisdom of such an alternative as turning a triple measure tune into one of duple rhythm, but a foot-note to No. 217 says: 'This Tune may also be sung in Common Time if preferred, by making the Semibreves, throughout, into Minims.' As the first line of this tune is identical in melody with the opening phrase of the air 'What though I trace each herb and flower' in the oratorio of 'Solomon,' it is evident that Handel knew Day's Psalms of 1563. By the way, is this tune, in either rhythm, quite suitable for 'The Son of God goes forth to war'?

An interesting feature is the appearance, in different parts of the book, of the same tune in two keys, e.g., Melcombe, Rockingham, St. Peter, each of which is set in E flat and D; Nun danket and St. Matthias, in F and G, and so on. This, although most useful, is not a new idea, as the same thing occurs in Dr. Miller's 'Psalms of David' (1790), wherein his time-honoured tune Rockingham first appeared, the said tune being severally printed in the keys of E flat, E, and F. We are glad to find in the book under notice that Miller's original dotted-note, passing from E flat to G in the penultimate bar, has been restored. It seems a pity that Wainwright's tune to 'Christians, awake' (No. 63) should not have been transposed a tone lower, by reason of the three high F sharps in the melody.

It is satisfactory to find that Miles's Lane now appears in its proper melodic form, with its scalewise progression to B flat at the end of the first line; in the former edition the note was D, which gave the impression that the words should be sung: 'Let angels prostrate rise!' Why was Mendelssohn's tune to Charles Wesley's Christmas Hymn not corrected? The melodic error in this tune, perpetrated in the first edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' has unfortunately been copied into several other hymnals, and now the error of forty-three years ago has been repeated. Bedford is welcomed in its original triple rhythm, but in all probability the syncopations in the second and fourth lines (the original contains them in all the lines), beautiful as they are, will not be accurately sung by a congregation. Gauntlett's tune to 'Once in royal David's city' now appears in its pristine form, as an unison melody with childlike chordal accompaniment; but surely Gauntlett's original and simple harmony should have been adopted in the last two lines, instead of introducing those careering quavers, which, like the altered harmony (especially the chord of B major), distort the composer's intention. While on the subject of harmony, the question may be asked: Who is responsible for the much altered chords of Dykes's tune Pax Dei ('Saviour, again to Thy dear Name we raise')? As the composer died nearly thirty years ago it looks as if the re-harmonized form of the tune (No. 32 in the new book) is an unauthorized piece of tinkering. Wir plügen ('We plough the fields and scatter') is another instance of new harmonization in chromatic chords which makes the tune almost unrecognizable, while the unison phrase in Moscow (No. 526) is harmonized in spite of the expressed Tasto solo direction of the composer. Again, the 18th century tune 'Duke Street'—now here introduced for the first time—is not only set forth in modern harmonies, but its melody has been altered. Such distortions are unwarrantable, and call for stern rebuke.

The editor, or editors—whatever he or they may be—are to be congratulated upon having discovered the composer of the tune Belmont, which is here assigned to W. Garbline. As the origin of this tune has hitherto baffled all the researches of investigators, the information given is very acceptable. But who is Mr. Garbline? The additions include Helmsley ('Lo! He comes with clouds descending'); Attwood's 'Come, Holy Ghost' (the birth-year of the composer is wrongly stated); and two verses of 'God save the King,' The inclusion of Goss's fine tune to 'Praise, my soul, the King of heaven' is most welcome. The 'Old rooth' again appears in its ancient form, long and short notes, but a foot-note states, 'The tune may be sung in more modern rhythm by treating the semibreves as minims.' Aurelia is headed 'Slow,' a precaution which is very necessary in order to prevent this truly congregational tune from being scrambled through. The form in which the fine old minor tune 'Windor' (or 'Dundee') is given may be very interesting from an antiquarian point of view, but what of the congregation in endeavouring to master its unrhythmical difficulties?

In the process of revision it was inevitable that a large number of tunes should be cast out by reason of their unsuitability for congregational purposes, and some had to go because the words with which they were allied have not found a place in the new edition—e.g., the tunes to 'O Paradise.' But considerable disappointment will be experienced at the absence of such familiar strains as Mr. Willing's tune Alstone ('We are but little children weak'); Sir Herbert Oakeley's Edina ('Saviour, blessed Saviour'); Dr. W. B. Gilbert's Maidstone ('Pleasant are Thy courts above'); Woodbury's familiar tune to 'For ever with the Lord'; Schulthes's Requiem; W. H. Monk's Miserere; Dykes's settings of 'Hark! my soul, it is the Lord' (replaced by a tune that is not nearly so expressive of the words) and 'Days and moments quickly flying'; Stainer's music to 'There is a blessed home' and 'The roseate hues'; and Barnby's tunes to 'When morning gilds the skies' and 'For all the saints.' One could not regret the absence of these familiar tunes had they been replaced by others more suitable and congregational, but such is not the case.

Some tunes have been divorced from the words with which they have hitherto been associated—e.g., W. H. Monk's St. Matthias to 'Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go,' this favourite evening hymn now being mated to Carey's tune 'Surrey,' which is of a less prayerful nature than the former tune. Again, Mr. J. W. Elliott's admirable tune 'Day of rest' has been removed from 'O Jesus, I have promised' to a hymn in the Temperance section of the book, whereby it will be much less used than formerly. The extraordinary incongruity of associating Gauntlett's St. Alphege with two hymns of such opposite sentiment as 'The voice that breathed o'er Eden' and 'Brief life is here our portion' has been rectified, the tune being considered more funereal than matrimonial in its character.

So far we have compared the material in the new book with that of the old, the music of which—if we except the unfortunate Supplement of 1889—has in an unprecedented manner won its way into the affections of countless worshippers of various denominations. In regard to the actual new tunes, it is to be feared that many of them are distinctly uncongregational. The large number of plain-song melodies, set forth in their Gregorian garb, may or may not promote the praise of the great congregation; in this respect however alternative non-plain or plainer song melodies are available. The larger number of German chorales—beautiful indeed in themselves—may be of doubtful value from a practical point of view, as English people have never taken kindly to these hallowed Teutonic melodies.

We have now to speak of the actual new tunes in the book, those that have not hitherto appeared anywhere. Judging from the information furnished by 'Copyright 1904 by the Proprietors of Hymns Ancient and Modern,' these tunes are 53 in number. As Mr. B. Luard Selby contributes no fewer than 22 of these 53 novelties, it might be inferred that he has edited (musically) the book, but no information on this point, or in regard to any advisory committee, is vouchsafed. Next to Mr. Selby in numerical order is Sir Hubert Parry, who contributes 9 new tunes; followed by Sir Charles Stanford with 7; Dr. Charles Wood with 3; Mr. W. Phillips and Mr. S. H. Nicholson each with 2; while the following composers are responsible for one tune each: Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, Dr. P. C. Buck, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Mr. Charles Macpherson, Dr. M. J. Monk, Mr. T. T. Noble, Mr. G. Gilbert Stocks, and Mr. C. Lee Williams.

The majority of these new tunes are not melodically distinguished, and they are further handicapped by being impregnated with archaic harmony which is in danger of becoming a cult. Some of the tunes are very long and therefore difficult for a congregation to remember: the words are sometimes responsible for this—e.g., No. 153, a metre of 10.11.11.11.12.11.10.11, and the tune consists of thirty-two bars, only one of the four-bar phrases being repeated. In one instance—No. 325, its metre 11.10.11.5 D—it would have been quite possible to have had a four-line tune without violating the poetic form of the words. Of the composers who have contributed the new tunes, Sir Hubert Parry stands pre-eminent for his diatonic melodies and sane harmony, whereby he upholds all the best traditions of English psalmody. As in his larger compositions Sir Hubert is true to himself, and shuns that affectation which is as unreal as it is uncalled for. Of the nine tunes composed by the Director of the Royal College of Music we pick out for special commendation No. 569, an ideal children's hymn wedded to an ideal children's tune. Sir Hubert has not only triumphed over the difficulty of the nine lines in each verse, but has written strains which, in their crotchet garb, are delightfully childlike and tunelessly refreshing. Another capital tune by him is the last in the book, No. 643, a setting of a 'Litany for use at sea.' Here we have the very essence of devotional melody combined with dignified harmony. As a yachtsman, perhaps Sir Hubert was specially inspired in writing this tune; at all events it can honestly be classed A1.

Sir Charles Stanford has composed two meritorious tunes. The first is a setting—the only one in the book, Barnby's well-known tune having been discarded—of 'For all the Saints who from their labours rest' (No. 220). Here we have a fine, broad diatonic melody in G, beginning on the lower and ending on the upper dominant and within the compass of an octave, for voices in unison with well-written varied organ accompaniments. One verse, the fourth, is however indicated to be sung in harmony: its upper part is different from the rest of the tune, but the composer has very cleverly introduced the main melody in the under parts—the first strain in the alto, the second and third strains in the tenor (except two notes which appear in the bass), while the last strain takes its normal place in the soprano part. Heartily sung by a large choir and congregation, and supported by an adequate organ accompaniment, this tune is sure to become popular, as it deserves to be. Sir Charles Stanford has also set 'Praise to the Holiest in the height' in the form of an unison tune with free organ accompaniment for verses 1 and 7, in which the plagal cadence is introduced with good effect; but a harmonized tune, with a different melody and ending on the dominant chord, is assigned to verses 2 to 6.

Dr. Dykes's well-known tune to this hymn has been retained for those who prefer a simpler setting.

The following composers deserve honourable mention for the subjoined tunes: Mr. A. Herbert Brewer (No. 227); Dr. Percy Buck (No. 263), a tune in C, wherein is a descending scale passage in thirds, in the tenor and bass parts, four times repeated; Mr. W. Phillips (No. 268); Mr. B. Luard Selby (Nos. 284 and 357); and Dr. Charles Wood (No. 530). The last-named looks quite frisky in its notational dress—black notes, dotted quavers followed by semiquavers, and so on, but it is a very effective tune for all that. Dr. Wood has successfully caught the spirit of the hymn (under the heading of Foreign Missions) of which the first verse is:

Trumpet of God sound high;
Till the hearts of the heathen shake,
And the souls that in slumber lie
At the voice of the Lord awake.
Till the fenced cities fall
At the blast of the Gospel call,
Trumpet of God sound high!

The tune is in D, with a dominant close at the end of line 4; line 5 is in C; line 6 in B flat (sequences); and in line 7 a return is made to the original key, the voices singing in unison. The setting is most stirring and remarkably effective: its popularity at Foreign Missionary meetings and services in connection therewith is assured. It remains to be said that the ample indexes are a great improvement on the old edition, and as the names of the authors of words and composers of tunes are not printed above or below each hymn and tune, these indispensable sources of reference will be in great request. The printing of the book and its general arrangement are both satisfactory.

To sum up. There are many indications throughout the book of the ecclesiastical predilections of the proprietors (or compilers), and these have undoubtedly largely influenced the new music that therein finds a place; but, with obvious caution, they have not cut adrift their sheet anchor by casting out the tunes which, perhaps more than anything else, have made the fortunes of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' Regarded from the point of view of the worship-song of the great congregation, we do not think the new matter will strengthen the book and make it more acceptable than the older version, but the revision difficulties were doubtless considerable.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE CHOIRMASTER.

The Report of the Church Music Committee presented to the Worcester Diocesan Conference of 1904, held on November 23 at Birmingham, is a very interesting pamphlet. Much practical information, gathered from various sources, is contained in these thirty-two well-compiled pages, which may be read with profit and practical value. One recommendation of the Committee must be quoted, because of its great importance—an importance which does not appear to be sufficiently regarded on the part of certain examining Institutions. The Report says:

Whilst, in choosing an organist, due consideration should be paid to his ability as a player, it cannot be too often or too forcibly stated that his qualities as a choir-trainer and disciplinarian are infinitely more important matters.

Copies of the Report, at a cost of sixpence, post-free, may be obtained from the Hon. Secretary of the Committee, Mr. S. Royle Shore, 1, Newhall Street, Birmingham.

THE SILLINESS OF SOME HYMNS FOR CHILDREN.

Dr. Kendrick Pyne, organist of Manchester Cathedral, recently read a paper at a Diocesan Conference in that city on 'Music in relation to Public Worship.' The discourse dealt mainly with hymnody, and in the course of his remarks Dr. Pyne quoted from a hymn in which living children were supposed to apostrophize their defunct companions in such doggerel as this :

They cannot hear our footsteps come ;
They do not see us pass ;
They cannot feel the warm, bright sun
That shines upon the grass.

They do not hear when the great bell
Is ringing overhead ;

They cannot rise and come to church
With us, for they are dead.

No wonder !

WESLEY'S 'WILDERNESS.'

A correspondent writes :

As an ardent admirer of the genius of Samuel Sebastian Wesley, may I venture to protest against an act of the most wanton vandalism which is repeatedly committed by tenor singers when singing the short but dramatic recitative 'Then shall the lame man leap as an hart,' in the above anthem? I refer to the insertion of a horrid D sharp on the word 'man,' in place of C sharp, as written by Wesley, whereby the fine effect of the 'leap' to E sharp is entirely lost.

It may seem trifling to quibble over a point like this, but there is a danger of its developing into a 'traditional' reading, especially as I have heard it perpetrated both at St. Paul's Cathedral and also Westminster Abbey. No singer would ever dare to tamper with a Wagner or Elgar recitative ; why, then, should not Wesley be exempt ?

A fund has been started for the promotion of a memorial to the late Dr. W. H. Longhurst, organist of Canterbury Cathedral. In accordance with the wish of Dr. Longhurst's family the contributions will go towards the fund for the completion of the Cathedral organ, and a brass tablet, suitably inscribed, will form part of the proposed memorial. Dr. Perrin, organist of Canterbury Cathedral, the Hon. Secretary to the fund, will gratefully receive contributions thereto.

The last of the three organ recitals illustrating the German, French and English schools, given by Mr. H. Matthias Turton at St. Aidan's Church, Leeds, took place on November 17, when the following programme of English organ music was performed :

Fantasia and Toccata in D minor	...	Stanford
Sonata in G (2nd movement)	...	Elgar
Allegretto	...	Wolstenholme
Choral Song and Fugue	...	S. S. Wesley
Reverie in E flat (5-4 time)	...	Lemare
Cantilena (from the Sonata da Camera, No. 3)	...	A. I. Peace
Pæan	...	Basil Harwood
Choral with Variations	...	Henry Smart
Fantasia in C minor	...	Hoyle

At the Special Musical Service held at Holy Trinity Church, Marylebone, on Sunday afternoon, November 13, Gounod's 'Redemption' (Parts 1 and 2) was performed with full orchestral accompaniment and a chorus of a hundred selected voices. Previous to the service the orchestra impressively played a Prelude entitled 'Adoramus,' which Mr. Hugh Blair, the organist of the church, had written for the occasion, and which was conducted by him, as was also the 'Redemption' performance. Dr. C. E. Jolley presided at the organ.

The Degree of Doctor of Music was conferred at Oxford (on November 10) upon Mr. William Prendergast, organist of Winchester Cathedral. Congratulations to Dr. Prendergast.

Brahms's 'Requiem' is announced to be sung at St. Paul's Cathedral, under Sir George Martin's direction, and with full orchestral accompaniment, on Tuesday, December 6, at 7 p.m.

HANDEL AND HABERMANN.

In my articles entitled 'Handel's Borrowings' * mention was made of a Mass of Habermann's from which the master borrowed for his Oratorio 'Jephtha.' Dr. Crotch appears to have first called attention to this matter; and now there is fresh reference to it in the Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch for 1903. This publication contains an article entitled 'Franz Johann Habermann (1706-1783)' from the able pen of Dr. Max Seiffert, who refers to certain portions from five of six Masses by Habermann copied out by Handel, which copies are in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. The catalogue of the music in that Museum, drawn up by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland and Dr. A. H. Mann, mentions 'Handel's copy of a Mass or parts of a Mass by Habermann (a MS. copy of which is in the Buckingham Palace Library?)' The query evidently shows that the Handel MS. was not compared with the Habermann Mass; indeed it throws doubt on there being such a Mass in the Palace Library. Fortunately Dr. Seiffert has been able to compare the Handel MS. at Cambridge with complete scores of Habermann's Six Masses 'Philomela pia, melos suum sexies repetens: sive Missæ sex a IV. vocibus, II. violinis, II. clarinis, vel lituis ad libitum, et organo,' &c., published as Op. 1, in 1747, which he found in the library of the late Dr. Chrysander, and which formerly belonged to Thomas Greateorex, organist of Westminster Abbey from 1819 to his death in 1831. I may note in passing that probably these very scores were those from which Handel copied. Dr. Seiffert also consulted the published parts, which were kindly placed at his disposal by Dr. E. Mandyczewski. With such excellent material he has been able to quote five passages from Habermann's first Mass, one from the second, one from the third, one from the fourth, and one from the fifth, used by Handel for his Oratorio 'Jephtha.'

The passages are given in condensed score in Dr. Seiffert's article, so that it is easy, by comparison with the vocal or full score of the Oratorio, to see what use Handel actually did make of them; in one case a perusal of the facsimile score published by Dr. Chrysander is strongly recommended; to this I will presently refer.

The five passages from the first Mass were used for the chorus 'No more to Ammon's god and king,' for the bass aria 'Pour forth no more unheeded pray'rs,' for the tenor aria 'His mighty arm, with sudden blow,' for the chorus 'Chemosh, no more will we adore,' and for the chorus 'Theme sublime of endless praise'; of these borrowings four (the 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 5th) are mentioned in the Fitzwilliam Catalogue. One passage (a violin figure) from the second Mass is used in 'Cherubim and Seraphim'; one from the third in 'When his loud voice in thunder spoke'; one from the fourth in the Arioso of the third act 'Hide thou thy hated beams'; and one from the fifth in the chorus 'O God, behold our sore distress'; of these the Fitzwilliam Catalogue only mentions the last. The borrowings mentioned in the Catalogue amount then to five. In my original article I stated that there were four. I did not count the 'O God, behold our sore distress,' since the Catalogue merely stated that a 'subject' had been taken from Habermann's 'Kyrie Eleison,' and I thought it not worth while to include this, knowing how common it was for composers to use old fugue themes; of this practice there is more than one example in Bach's '48.'

As to the Handel borrowings Dr. Seiffert shows very clearly that they were intentional, but that in every case the composer improved upon the original. From the autograph score of 'Jephtha' we find that originally, in the bass aria 'Pour forth no more,' Handel's opening (with exception of the transposition from the key of A to that of F) was the same as that of Habermann's, but he afterwards decided to repeat the figure of the first bar. To make this clearer, I give the treble of Habermann's first two and Handel's first three bars:

HABERMANN.

HANDEL.

In order not to have the trouble of re-commencing the movement, he crowded in his first bar in the violin parts after the signature, wrote bis over the viola part, and also found room for the few extra bass notes.

Dr. Seiffert also notes that Handel used the principal theme of the 'Osanna' of the third Mass for the second movement of his organ Concerto in B flat (Op. 7, No. 3), a work which was completed just before (January 4, 1751) the composer began to compose his 'Jephtha': viz., on January 21, 1751. He further notes that Dr. Crotch—the first before Chrysander to seek out the sources whence Handel borrowed—in his organ arrangements of choruses from 'Jephtha' writes against each of the two choruses 'Doubtful fear, and reverend awe,' and 'Ye house of Gilead,' the words 'from Habermann.'

I regret that the Crotch arrangements which I consulted, and of which I made frequent mention in my article, are no longer in my possession. I stated that 'Dr. Crotch mentions six instances of borrowing from a Mass of Habermann's.' I have however again been able to consult a large, though not complete, collection of the Crotch arrangements and with the following result :

* THE MUSICAL TIMES, July, August, and September, 1901.

'When his loud voice in thunder spoke' has this foot-note: 'The first movement of this chorus from Habermann.'

'No more to Ammon's god' has no foot-note.

'Chemosh, no more' has 'This movement is taken almost exactly from a Mass by Habermann.'

'O God, behold our sore distress' has no foot-note.

'Cherubim and Seraphim' has 'The first movement of this chorus is from Habermann.'

'Theme sublime of endless praise' has 'The subjects from Habermann.'

'Ye House of Gilead' has 'From Habermann.'

I have therefore traced five of the six (?) mentioned; the sixth is almost to a certainty the 'Doubtful fear' noticed above.

Sir Arthur Sullivan: his life and music. By B. W. Findon. [James Nisbet and Company, Limited.]

This is the fourth monograph in book form on Sir Arthur Sullivan that has appeared; but the life of the distinguished musician, regarded from a strictly biographical point of view, has yet to be written. In the meantime this volume has a certain value in having been written by a kinsman of Sullivan's. In his preface Mr. Findon says: 'Many of these pages reflect the spirit of numerous conversations, and his [Sullivan's] opinions on matters which he would not openly discuss in his lifetime.' But there is scarcely any fresh light thrown upon the life of the composer, his early struggles, and so forth, while the paucity of the letters written by him—one of the most important features of biographical material—is somewhat disappointing. There are some controversial matters in the book that had better have been left in oblivion; discords such as these only jar in pages that are otherwise pleasantly written. The book contains an excellent portrait of Sullivan; but there is no index, and not even a table of chapter contents. A facsimile page of 'Essays in rhythm' is specially interesting. It contains eight examples of rhythmic experiments of the song 'Were I thy bride,' furnishing interesting proof of Sullivan's painstaking care in the all-important matter of perfect accentuation of words in their musical settings.

ANTHEMS.

When Israel came out of Egypt. By Samuel Wesley.

I will not leave you comfortless. By William Byrd.

When the Lord turned again. By Eaton Fanning.

Sun of my Soul. By G. W. Chadwick.

The Lord is my Shepherd. By Henry Smart.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

It would be superfluous to draw attention to so well-known and splendid a motet for double chorus as Samuel Wesley's 'In exitu Israel' were it not for the fact that Dr. George J. Bennett has furnished the music with English words. This task he has most admirably discharged, and therefore it is desirable in the cause of Art that the English version of a vocal masterpiece should be made known.

The anthem by William Byrd is taken from Book II. of the Gradualia, dating from 1610. The words are translated from the Introit for the Sunday after Ascension, and the music has been edited by Mr. John E. West, who has the qualifications of wide experience and artistic discretion.

Dr. Eaton Fanning's setting of 'When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion' was composed for the 250th Festival of the Sons of the Clergy at St. Paul's Cathedral. The work, laid out for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, is opened by the soloist, who is soon answered by a jubilant chorus in four parts. A short unisonal passage for the basses leads to another chorus more dignified in character. A specially effective portion of the anthem is the delivery by the soloist of the words 'Turn our captivity, O Lord,' while the choir respond softly 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.' With the subsequent Biblical words is built up an effective climax which closes the composition.

Mr. Chadwick has selected for his text the familiar evening hymn of Keble. The music is very simple and devotional. Two verses are set for tenor solo and one for the full choir, the melody given out by the former being repeated by the latter, with a well-written Coda terminating with a two-fold Amen.

The 23rd Psalm is one that would appeal with special attractiveness to a composer of Henry Smart's temperament, and he had the good sense not to distort the simple words of the Psalmist by attempts at mere word-painting. In the present four-part version of the anthem—originally set as a duet for equal voices—the opening phrases are assigned to tenors and basses, and the remainder to the full choir. Its melodiousness may be taken for granted, and Mr. Bellairs has arranged the voice parts and added an organ accompaniment to a composition which will doubtless be warmly welcomed by reason of its devotional spirit and practical utility.

The Life of Sir Herbert Stanley Oakeley. Compiled by his brother, Edward Murray Oakeley. [George Allen.]

If the life of Sir Herbert Oakeley had to be written, no more sympathetic or appreciative biographer could have been found than his brother, the compiler of this book. For twenty-five years the subject of this memoir held the Reid Chair of Music in Edinburgh University, where he organized the Reid concerts, gave 200 organ recitals, and delivered professorial lectures. To the further credit of the account must be put his zeal for the foundation of graduation in music at the University, a natural corollary of the professorship which he lived to see accomplished. His other musical work was of a journalistic nature on the Guardian, to which he contributed accounts of various musical festivals. Mr. E. M. Oakeley pleasantly describes the career of his brother—the school days at Rugby; the student period at Christ Church, Oxford; the Edinburgh professorship; and the eventide of life passed at Dover, where Sir Herbert Oakeley died at the age of seventy-three. One of the most interesting things in the memoir is the reference to Oakeley's organ-playing at Lambourn Church in 1858, which so affected and unsettled a boy residing there that music thenceforth became the longing of his life. The name of that boy is George C. Martin, who has since been heard of beyond the region of the Berkshire village where he was born and began his musical life.

The well got-up volume contains seven illustrations, of which a facsimile of the autograph of Bach's B minor Prelude for the Organ is the most interesting—no wonder that this manuscript was one of Oakeley's 'most dearly-prized treasures.' We must not omit to mention that Sir Herbert Oakeley held the office of 'Hon. composer of music to H. M. in Scotland,' the duties of which could not have been very arduous.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Musical Association—our only learned society—flourishes, and it is now a legally incorporated body. It has united in membership a large proportion of the most eminent musicians and best-known amateurs in the country, and its alliance with the International Society of Musicians brings it into touch with continental musicians. The papers read at the monthly meetings—which in future will be held at Broadwood's handsome new small concert-room in Conduit Street—are contributed by experts in the subjects with which they deal. The volumes of the Proceedings of the Association are a mine of wealth to the historian, the antiquarian, and inquirers into the philosophical basis of the art of music.

The thirtieth annual meeting was held at Broadwood's on November 15. Sir Hubert Parry was in the chair. A satisfactory report was read by the Secretary, Mr. J. Percy Baker, and the necessary formal business was despatched. After the business meeting the first paper of the new session was read by Mr. William Shakespeare, the subject being 'Singing as an art.' There was an unusually large audience, attracted no doubt by the annual meeting, the personality and reputation of a famous singing-master, and the prospect of the Annual Dinner. As to the last-mentioned attraction it is a remarkable fact that members of the Association who do not attend the monthly meetings have annual prickings of conscience that impel them to attend at all costs this agreeable function.

Mr. Shakespeare's paper was historical, philosophical and didactic. He made lengthy reference to the old masters (on whose methods, by-the-way, the modern methods, totally different as they are from one another, are all based), and pointed out how careful they were as teachers and composers to keep in view the natural capacities of singers. Purcell's 'Dido's lament' and 'Let the mighty engines,' Alessandro Scarlatti's 'Toglietemi la vita ancor,' and 'O, cessati di piagarmi,' Lotti's 'Pur dicesti,' and Caldara's 'Selve Amiche' were mentioned as splendid examples of songs demanding sostenuto style and the execution of scale passages. Porpora (b. 1686) was described as the greatest singing-master who ever lived. The feats of Farinelli and the pure vocal compositions of Pergolesi were described and illustrated. What was the essence of the style of this grand vocal art? Unerring attack on the note in the 'very centre' of the sound; the power of sustaining all notes and joining them to others with a perfect legato without jerkiness, or slurring; the messa di voce, or swelling from piano to forte and back to the softest sound without loss of quality; command over execution; expression and pathos; breadth of phrasing—which is only possible to those who have command of a long breath—and intensity of carrying power sufficient for the largest halls and theatres. Handel, Bach, Mozart, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi knew how to bring into play all these resources of singers. They gave singers time to breathe and collect themselves, whereas later composers often gave little or no time for the singer to breathe. Handel's writing for the voice was praiseworthy, but Bach at times gives the singer uncouth and awkward passages, difficult chromatic intervals, words to recite on the highest notes, and he treats the voice too much as though it were a solo stop on the organ, and he disregards compass of the most favourable parts pertaining to the different voices. But in spite of this Bach produced some great effects.

Mr. Shakespeare then went on to deal in detail with many technical points of singing—e.g., the placing of the voice, the method of breathing, pronunciation, the poisoning of the larynx over the breath, the looseness of the neck, jaw, and tongue. He concluded his paper by appealing to composers to study the art of writing for a voice as they do already study the art of writing for a violin or a pianoforte, or any other instrument. All this interesting matter was followed by the audience with keen attention, and at the end, after a few remarks from Dr. Cummings, who presided, a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Shakespeare was passed unanimously.

The dinner took place at the Monico Restaurant and was in every way a success. Mr. Clifford Edgar, Dr. Charles Maclean, Sir Frederick Bridge, and the President, Sir Hubert Parry, all made excellent speeches, and a well-chosen programme of music was performed by Dr. Markham Lee, Miss Bessie Cartwright, Mr. Philip Cathie (violin), Madame Koenig (pianoforte), Mr. G. A. Clinton (clarinet) and Mr. W. Y. Hurleston.

CO-OPERATIVE OPERA AT SHEFFIELD.

In November, 1903, an article appeared in the Sheffield Daily Telegraph which elicited from Mr. Charles Manners, of the Moody-Manners Opera Company, a letter, in which he stated that, as he had usually lost money when he came to Sheffield, he was prepared to give a series of eight opera performances if some means could be adopted for ensuring the payment of his bare out-of-pocket expenses. He further stated that should there be any profit it could go to any educational or charitable object selected by the local parties to the contract. This offer was accepted by Mr. T. Walter Hall, chairman of the Sheffield Musical Festival Committee, on behalf of the Sheffield University Fund. A strong local committee was formed, a long list of patrons obtained, and organizing machinery put into motion. Mr. Manners, on his part, contracted to combine the whole of his A and B touring companies and perform a mutually-selected repertory with a musical force consisting of a chorus numbering eighty-five, an orchestra of sixty, a ballet of twelve, and twenty-four principal singers. The repertory consisted of 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Mignon,' 'Lohengrin,' 'I Pagliacci,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' and a so-called 'gala' performance consisting of a selected act, the first in each case, from 'Die Walküre,' 'Siegfried,' and 'Lohengrin.'

The scheme aroused much interest in Sheffield, and during the first two days the advance booking exceeded £600. The Theatre Royal was well filled during the entire series, and a substantial profit will accrue from the experiment. The performances were of a high order of merit, especially in respect of chorus, orchestra, and scenery. In 'Faust' Sir Henry Irving's Lyceum scenery was used, and in the 'Ring' selections, special mounting was prepared. Chorally the performances were unique for the provinces. The cumulative effect of such scenes as those of the Tournament of Song in 'Tannhäuser,' the Kermesse and Soldiers' Chorus in 'Faust,' and the first acts of 'Lohengrin,' with an ensemble numbering 160 performers, was distinctly imposing. The two separate acts from 'Die Walküre' and 'Siegfried' were also excellently rendered, Mme. Clementine de Vere as Sieglinde and Mr. Wilson Pembroke (Siegmund and Siegfried) winning pronounced successes. The production of 'Tristan und Isolde' (with Madame Blanche Marchesi and Mr. Joseph O'Mara in the title parts) was another feature of the week. At the conclusion of the series of performances the University students organized a demonstration. This took the form of a torchlight procession in which Mr. and Mrs. Charles Manners and Mr. T. Walter Hall, seated in a carriage, were dragged through the main streets, a scene that was witnessed by thousands of people. Madame Moody-Manners subsequently sang from the balcony of her hotel to an immense concourse of people.

The importance of the venture lies in its possibilities. If the co-operative idea can be extended, in the provinces at least, its bearing upon the future of English opera may have the most beneficial results. It is this aspect of the matter which has created widespread interest in an experiment the success of which may lead to much profitable imitation.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Yet again Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' attracted thousands of music-loving folk to the Albert Hall on the opening night (November 10) of a new season—the thirty-fourth—of the Royal Choral Society. The non-appearance of Madame Suzanne Adams was a disappointment, for she has not been heard in London in oratorio, but an excellent substitute was found in Madame Emily Squire. Mr. Dalton Baker, if not fulfilling all that is expected from the exponent of the Prophet, sang so well and with such artistic discernment that he confirmed the good opinions of his capabilities elicited by his singing at the recent Gloucester Festival. Miss Ada Crossley and Mr. John Harrison acquitted themselves of their respective tasks with their usual distinction. Detailed criticism of the choral singing is unnecessary, but it should be recorded that under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge the Kensington choristers reached a high standard of excellence.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Great interest was manifested in the second concert given by the London Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall on November 17, owing to the engagement of Herr Arthur Nikisch. His readings of Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture and Brahms's 'Variations on a Theme by Haydn' were wonderful with regard to precision and clearness of detail, while the interpretations of the Overture to 'Tannhäuser' and Tschaiikovsky's Fifth Symphony were superb, and roused enthusiasm to a pitch rarely witnessed at Queen's Hall. The distinctive feature of the performance of the Overture was its spirituality. There was no lack of forcible expression, but it was never coarse. The waltz movement in the Symphony was taken much slower than usual, which was decidedly an improvement, a certain languorous grace being imparted to the music which removed the suggested flippancy of this measure in a symphony. The soloist was M. Rinarde, who played very finely in M. Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto in B minor.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A few lines by way of encouragement are due to some of the students of the Royal Academy of Music who took part in the concert given by the Institution on November 21 at Queen's Hall. The chief honours were gained by the vocalists. Miss Caroline G. Hatchard, who is gifted with a soprano voice of excellent quality and considerable power, sang Liszt's 'Schwebe, Schwebe' and 'Jugendglück' in a sympathetic manner that indicated an artistic temperament, and Mr. Philip Simmons made effective use of a pleasing tenor voice in Goring Thomas's song 'Memories,' and is also to be commended for clearness of articulation. The Celtic songs by Mr. Arnold E. Trevor Bax were carefully rendered by Miss Ethel M. Lister, but with the exception of the first, entitled 'Eilidh, my fawn,' the vocalist had not grateful phrases to sing. The second of the series, 'Closing Doors,' is ambitious, and testified to artistic aims. Another work by a student was the first number of a Pianoforte Trio in E flat by Miss Zénie Weisberg, which proved a bright, tuneful, and ingeniously written movement. It was effectively rendered by Mr. E. R. Woof, (violin), and Mr. B. W. O'Donnell (violinocello), with the fair composer at the keyboard. Other students who bore witness to having profited by good training at Tenterden Street were Miss Myra Hess and Miss Hilda F. M. Barnes.

The following scholarships, &c., have recently been awarded at the Royal Academy of Music. The Ada Lewis Scholarships: Singing, John Bardsley (Farnworth, Lancashire) and Clara Butterworth (Harpurhey, Lancashire); Violin, Francis Joseph Thorns (Weston-under-Lizard); Violoncello, Edgar Fawcett (Ecclehill, Yorkshire); Organ, Redgewell G. Danksie (London); The Wessely Exhibition to Thomas Morgan (Dowlais); The John Thomas (Welsh) Scholarship, to Percy Hughes (Aberdare); The Baume (Manx) Scholarship to George Samuel Robinson (Michael, Isle of Man); The Sainton-Dolby Scholarship to Ethel Marguerite Pound (London); The Ross Scholarship (singing) to Ida Kahn (London); The Ross Scholarship (Wood-Wind instruments) to Emile Henry Medicus (Youngstown, Ohio, U.S.A.) for Flute playing; The Committee Scholarship, to Edith A. Kirk (contralto), of Leicester.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The second of the Symphony Concerts, conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood at Queen's Hall, took place on November 12, and was distinguished by first performances in London of 'Das Hexenlied,' by Max Schillings, and a symphonic poem entitled 'Penthesilea,' by Hugo Wolf. 'Das Hexenlied' is a poem by Ernst Von Wildenbruch, in which is related the dying confession of a monk who all his life had regretted not having connived at the escape of a girl condemned to be burnt as a witch for singing a certain song of fascinating character. The text was delivered with rare elocutionary skill and impressiveness by Miss Tita Brand, daughter of Madame Marie Brenna, but it cannot be said that the talented reciter received much help from Max Schillings's music. It is well written and appropriate, but by no means a brilliant example of melodrame. It should not be forgotten that our English composer, Mr. Frederick Corder, has written most expressive and appropriate music to the same poem, which has been successfully given more than once at Mrs. Tobias Matthay's recitals.

Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem did not prove satisfactory. Its programme is the expedition of the Amazonian Queen, Penthesilea, to capture Achilles. The first movement is martial and vigorous, but noisy. The second number, in which the Queen, made captive by Achilles, reveals her love for him, provides an effective contrast and is the most pleasing section of the work, the love theme possessing melodic charm; but with the third and last movement a return is made to the strenuous and somewhat coarse style of the opening number, and the death of Achilles and the suicide of Penthesilea are illustrated by strains of the most robust kind.

THE ALEXANDRA PALACE CHOIR.

'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed by the Alexandra Palace Choir on November 12, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. The choir numbered about 700, and the band was a very large one, and included many amateurs. This was the first performance of Elgar's great work given by the Choir. It drew what was, we believe, the largest audience as yet gathered to hear the work. No fewer than 6,000 people occupied the seats, and 2,000 more were in the 'standing room only.' The performance was an excellent one in many respects. It was not an easy matter to carry such ponderous resources through the rhythmic mazes and furious rushes of the demons' chorus, and it says much for Mr. Gill's decision and alertness that the execution of the difficult passages was correct and expressive. The band, although sometimes overweighed, was generally competent. Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Frederic Austin were the soloists. The audience was highly appreciative, and broke out into tumultuous applause whenever a chance was afforded.

'THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS' AT BLACKPOOL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

It would seem to be the ambition of every well-constituted choral society to include in its repertory 'The Dream of Gerontius.' The fact that an adequate performance of the work demands the most advanced and unusual choral technique, orchestral and solo singing resources of the highest class, and a conductor imbued with a peculiarly sympathetic temperament and power to control surging rhythmic combinations has apparently acted rather as a stimulant than as a deterrent. It is one of the side influences of this remarkable work that it has led to the focussing of executive talent on a large scale in quite unexpected places. The great festivals we have always with us, and they accustom us to great things. But when in places like Southport and Blackpool we hear of performances of an elaborate art-work like 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which in some points surpass even festival standards, we can estimate how much the executive side of the art is progressing in the country. These thoughts are suggested by a noteworthy performance of Elgar's work given at Blackpool on November 16. A local conductor, Mr. H. Whittaker, who has shown exceptional skill as a choir-trainer, mostly in the way of unaccompanied music of the madrigal type, boldly decided to risk his reputation in another sphere of the conductor's art by undertaking to produce 'The Dream of Gerontius' on the best possible scale. Sixty-four members of the Richter Manchester band, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Frederic Austin were engaged. The choir, specially organized for the occasion, consisted of 270 singers, about eighty of whom were imported from Sheffield—an importation of gratifying significance, inasmuch as these sturdy Sheffield choralists undertook the wearisome journey (they arrived home at 3 A.M.), not for pecuniary reward, but from sheer enthusiasm and a desire to show respect for a popular conductor, and to support his effort to present worthily a work which they are justly proud of having done so much to adequately perform both in Sheffield and London.

The performance was given in the sumptuous concert hall of the Tower, probably one of the finest concert rooms in the kingdom. It was soon evident that the utmost care had been expended on the preparation of the work. This theme may have been rather slower and that theme faster than usual, but when all is said under this head, one felt that the interpretation of the conductor's was deeply appreciative of the mystic spirituality of the composer's music. At no previous performance of the work I have heard was the semi-chorus so tenderly and impressively sung. Tone and intonation were absolutely perfect, and moreover the words were clearly defined. Altogether the first part of the work created a profound effect. At least it left me in a state bordering upon ecstasy. The second part was not so well performed. Mr. Whittaker, who had so far shown masterly control, did not handle the demons' chorus—a crux for the best conductors—with the necessary nerve and decision. Not that there was any approach to disaster, but simply a lack of great unity. Later, in 'Praise to the Holiest,' some thrilling climaxes were attained—it seemed as though the gates of heaven were thrown open, and that the mass of harmony gushed out. The beautiful and pathetic final section was not so successful, owing I think to the too long continuance of a decided six beats in the bar instead of the broader and more tranquil three into which the rhythm gradually drifts. It is enough to say of the principal soloists that Miss Muriel Foster and Mr. Coates were at their best. Mr. Frederic Austin, who is a less familiar exponent of the bass solos, sang with much fervour and occasional breadth. The audience, which numbered about two thousand persons, appeared to be much impressed.

Competition Festivals.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS.

It is gratifying to find that in this out-of-the-way corner of Lancashire a considerable section of the community exhibits real enthusiasm for musical study. The three days' festival (the sixth of the series), held on October 27, 28 and 29, was a pleasant evidence of this desire to learn and to excel. Inasmuch as the idea of the promoters of the scheme, as it is of many similar schemes, is to encourage the people to make music for themselves rather than to bring performers from the outside to be merely listened to, the Festival was necessarily cast in the competitive mould. Only in this way can soloists of all kinds and small choirs and bands be effectively encouraged. The competitions were arranged in 32 classes, and included pianoforte, violin, clarinet, brass quartets, solos and duets for all sorts of voices and choirs of various formations. Where possible the forces were combined to give a performance of a work. On the Children's Day the cantata 'The Spider and the Fly' (Wensley and Bridge), and, on the day for local choirs, Stanford's 'The Revenge' were performed. Many of the solo-singing results were of quite a high standard. Seven male-voice choirs, chiefly composed of the working classes, came from the surrounding district. The test-piece was Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch.' The Workington Orpheus, under Mr. Joseph Scott, gave a very fine performance and gained the first place, and the Lancaster Male-Voice Choir, under Mr. R. T. Grossé, came second, being only one mark behind. In the chief mixed-voice choir section the Barrow Madrigal Society, under Mrs. Bourne, gave excellent performances of 'Cupid and Rosalind' (Stanford) and 'Mary Morrison' (G. J. Bennett), and were placed first. Almost equally good were the performances of the Blackpool Orpheus Glee Society, under Mr. Clifford Higgin. The audiences were generally large, and always keenly attentive and appreciative. The Festival is well managed in every respect, from the choice of music for competition down to the smallest detail, by the musical and business men and others who devote themselves unsparingly to the social welfare of the town. Mr. T. G. Symons is the secretary. Dr. McNaught conducted the concerts and adjudicated the competitions for the third time.

KEIGHLEY.

The "Summerscales" competitions, the thirteenth of the series, were held at Keighley on October 22 and 29. There were numerous entries in the varied sections for choirs and solo singers and players. Fourteen male-voice choirs competed in the section for local choirs, the first place going to the Ilkley Orpheus Glee Union (Mr. T. A. Earnshaw).

Thirty-four sopranos and twenty basses competed. Harrogate (Mr. Hiram Ball) won the chief mixed-voice prize and the female-voice choir prize. There were eleven male-voice choirs in the open class. The Habergam Glee Union, Burnley (Mr. Ernest Hitchon), were well ahead and gained the first prize. Dr. Henry Coward and Mr. Isidor Cohn were the adjudicators.

London Concerts.

The third series of Messrs. Broadwood's Chamber Concerts began on November 3 at Æolian Hall, when the chief works on the programme were Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 18, No. 1), and Mendelssohn's Octet for Strings, the 'Cathie' quartet party being joined by the 'Wessely' company in an excellent performance of the latter delightful work. Three Novelletten in E flat for strings, by Mr. Frank Bridge, played for the first time, proved vivacious and attractive pieces that merit widespread favour. Miss Susan Strong was the vocalist and sang delightfully.

For the second concert on November 17 was engaged the Bohemian Quartet, who played Borodin's Quartet in D and Brahms's Quintet (Op. 115) with great spirit and finish. The vocalist was M. Camille Decreux.

Miss Ethel Barns and Mr. Charles Phillips commenced their tenth series of Chamber Concerts on November 1, at Bechstein Hall. A new Pianoforte Trio in F minor by the former artist was introduced, and in common with previous compositions by Miss Barns proved a tuneful, well written and tersely developed work. The composer was assisted by Miss Lucie von Hulst and Mr. George Mackern in an excellent performance. Mention is also due of Miss Kate Fielder, a young vocalist gifted with a contralto voice of considerable power and rich quality, which is admirably produced.

The chief feature of Mr. Plunket Greene's recital at Æolian Hall on November 11 was the first performance in London of Sir Charles Stanford's 'Five Songs of the Sea,' produced at the recent Leeds Festival. The most warmly-received numbers were those entitled 'Homeward bound' and 'Outward bound.' Mr. Greene was also very successful in his rendering of a ditty called 'Row, Burnie, Row,' by Mr. A. Burgess Weston, and Mr. Arthur Hinton's 'Piping down the valleys wild.'

Señor Arbos played two pleasing pieces from his own pen at his recital at Bechstein Hall on November 12. They are respectively called 'Guajiras' and 'La Zambra,' and the latter had not previously been performed in public. They are typically Spanish in character, and their composer rendered them with a verve and significance that elicited enthusiastic applause. The most serious effort of the afternoon was a performance of César Franck's Sonata in A, in which Señor Arbos received sympathetic assistance from Miss Evelyn Stuart at the pianoforte.

At St. James's Hall on November 10, M. Fritz Kreisler gave a farewell recital before leaving for a tour in America. His programme contained a Concerto in E minor, by Jules Conus, a Russian composer new to Londoners. The Concerto contained many effective passages for the solo instrument, but in its entirety it possesses little musical interest.

Miss Evangeline Anthony, the young Hereford violinist, made her first appearance in London at St. James's Hall on November 5, when she proved by her playing in Mendelssohn's Concerto, and in other works, that the reputation she has gained in the provinces had been well merited. Miss Anthony was admirably supported by the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Cowen.

The programme of Miss Mary Louisa White's concert at Steinway Hall on November 17 was devoted entirely to her own compositions. There was a pleasing Minuet, and a Novlette, which had in it something of Schumann's restless spirit. Songs were agreeably sung by Miss Esmé Atherden and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. The 'Sleep, little baby, sleep' proved simple and tasteful, and 'The Maypole' bright and pleasing. Miss White is an accomplished pianist, and her performances elicited much applause.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, November 15.

'Lakmé,' by Delibes, a novelty here, has recently been given at the Opera House. The performance was excellent, and the wonderful mounting of the piece was quite poetical, as indeed the subject-matter demands. Frl. Kurz in the title-role achieved striking success both by her singing and dancing.

The Singakademie intends to give a popular performance of Haydn's 'Creation' in the Jubilee Theatre. During the first half of the 19th century Haydn's two oratorios were performed once every year at the Hofburg Theatre for benevolent purposes. From the fund thus collected the widows and orphans of our musicians are maintained even to the present day. These performances were subsequently given only at concerts; now a return is being made to the theatre, where they still delight the public.

The a capella choir founded a few years back by Eugen Thomas is largely devoted to the cultivation of old vocal music. It has given performances of works by Orlando di Lasso, Palestrina, and Donati; also by Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and others.

Our chief orchestral concerts have offered much that is interesting. At the Philharmonic, Felix Mottl conducted one of Mozart's rarely-heard symphonies, and a pleasing, well-constructed Scherzo in C minor by Hans Pfitzner. The Concert Society under the direction of Ferdinand Löwe gave a Slav Rhapsody, one of the fanciful Legends, and the 'Husitská' Overture in memory of Antonin Dvořák, also the First Symphony of Gustav Mahler, a composer of a very different type. But however honoured and admired for his noble activity as director at the Opera House, Mahler's First Symphony did not excite any special sympathy with the public.

Eugen D'Albert performed Beethoven's two Pianoforte Concertos in G and E flat, and so admirably that one seemed to be listening to them for the first time. His wife sang some of her husband's excellent songs with orchestral accompaniment. Frederick Lamond has also played here with success.

A great crowd was expected at the concert of the twelve-year-old violin virtuoso, Mischa Elman, of whom previous to his arrival wonderful tales had been told. Evidently the public is surfeited with prodigy children, for the attendance at the concert was small. However, Elman, a Russian by birth, astonished even the most blasés by his wonderful though simple playing. His technique is astonishingly sure and pure, but his tone as yet is not very powerful and warm; this, indeed, is a good sign for the natural development of his extraordinary talent.

In the department of chamber music many interesting novelties have been heard. The Rosé Quartet introduced a pleasing Quintet for Strings by Taniewicz, and the lady pianist Wunder-Wierer favoured us with a clever Pianoforte Sextet by Paul Juon, a Russian by birth, who lives in Berlin, and whose chamber music is among the most attractive at the present day. A young pianist and writer on music, Dr. Schenker, performed a hitherto unknown Pianoforte Concerto in A minor of Philipp Emanuel Bach's, while at the same concert his colleague Moriz Violin (composer and pianist in spite of his name) conducted Mozart's great Serenade in C minor for wind instruments, that written by Mozart for Prince Schwarzenberg, and which he afterwards converted into a quintet for strings. The lovely work in its original form aroused indescribable enthusiasm: it is young and fresh, and yet it is more than a hundred and twenty years old!

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Queen's College chamber concerts, of which Dr. Lawrence Walker is the Director, gave their first concert of the season on October 31, and thereat the Verbrugghen Quartet appeared. Miss M. Kisack as singer and Dr. Walker himself as pianist performed an excellent selection of music, the most novel feature being the duet by Wieniawski for violin and viola, played by Messrs. Verbrugghen and Walter Haig.

The work at the second concert of the Philharmonic Society on November 18 was Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' in which the solo parts were filled by Miss Ethel Henry Bird, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Signor Manrico Bacci, and Mr. Andrew Black. The performance was in all respects satisfactory, and although this might be taken as almost a matter of course with such a well-known oratorio, it should be remembered that in a living and healthy organism like the Philharmonic Society there is a constant growth of new material, both in chorus and orchestra, in the training of which the conductor has to begin au fond. The chorus is entirely amateur and the orchestra almost the same, so that a good performance gives proof, if it were needed, of the care and skill of Dr. Koeller, which indeed are worthy of the reputation which he has so deservedly gained.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Midland Musical Society at the Town Hall Saturday popular concert of October 29 gave an excellent performance of Parts I. and II. of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha,' with Miss Annie Warden, Mr. Walter Lawley, and Mr. John Ridding as principals. A short miscellaneous selection followed. Mr. A. J. Cotton conducted. On the following Saturday, November 5, Mr. F. W. Beard gave an orchestral concert with a Tschaikovsky programme. This included the 'Pathetic' Symphony, the Intermezzo 'The Battle of Poltava' from the opera 'Mazeppa,' the Suite 'Casse-Noisette,' and the Overture '1812.' Mr. Karl Johannessen was the soloist in the Sérénade Mélancolique for violin and orchestra, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard contributed songs.

The first concert of the Halford Society was held in the Town Hall on November 8, when a crowded audience extended a hearty welcome to the conductor, Mr. George Halford, and the violinist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, who has become an immense favourite here. Mr. Kreisler's rendering of the solo part in Tschaikovsky's Violin Concerto (Op. 35) was magnificent, and evoked the most enthusiastic applause. Mr. Halford conducted fine performances of Beethoven's First Symphony, Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyl,' and the Variations from Tschaikovsky's Third Suite.

The young Birmingham violinist, Miss Margaret Holloway, with a local pianist, Mr. Howard Hadley, gave a concert in the Masonic Hall during the last week of October. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata were the chief works performed, and both were finely played.—Mr. Max Mossel's drawing-room concerts opened at the Grosvenor Rooms (Grand Hotel) on October 27. Señor Sarasate and Dr. Neitzel played several pieces for violin and pianoforte, among them Sarasate's new fantasia on Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' which pleased greatly.—Miss Cecy Naughton and Mr. John Waterhouse gave a pianoforte and violin recital in the Masonic Hall on November 2, with Miss Eva Dickinson as vocalist. An attractive programme included Dvořák's Romantische Stücke (Op. 75), Ernst's Concerto in F sharp, and the Scherzo in E flat of Brahms. Miss Dickinson made a very favourable début.—On November 4 in the new Temperance Hall, Miss Emmeline L. Marks gave a concert assisted by Mr. Jacques Renard, violoncellist. The programme was interesting and varied. Miss Marks revealed talent in Schumann's 'Carnaval,' and Mr. Renard greatly impressed the audience by his fine tone in Bargiel's Adagio. Mr. Wymark Stratton accompanied the violoncello solos.

A benefit concert was given to Mrs. Stockham, a local harpist, in the Town Hall on November 15. In July last Mrs. Stockham and her band of harps were engaged at Southsea, and lost valuable instruments and other property by the fire that destroyed the pier. This concert, with various subscriptions, it is hoped will compensate Mrs. Stockham. A number of artists assisted gratuitously, and the hall was crowded.—Madame Minadieu gave a vocal recital at the Edgbaston Assembly Rooms on November 18. She sang seventeen songs, in four languages, and revealed high artistic powers. Mr. Willy Lehmann contributed violoncello solos, and Mr. G. H. Manton accompanied.

At the Midland Institute, on November 3, Mr. E. S. Fry gave an interesting lecture on the 'Development of the bow for stringed instruments,' illustrated by diagrams and musical examples. On November 5, Mr. Johann C. Hock began a series of violoncello recitals in connection with the Institute School of Music. He played concertos by Haydn and Saint-Saëns, and Bach's Sonata No. 2 in D minor.

One of the oldest members of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society died at Penkridge on October 24, in his eighty-third year. This was Mr. Robert James Heap, an enthusiastic musical amateur, and the promoter of many concerts in years gone by; but he was better known as the father of the late Dr. Charles Swinnerton Heap, one of Birmingham's most gifted sons.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

An orchestral concert was given at the Victoria Rooms on October 28 for the purpose of showing that the players in the city and neighbourhood were capable of effectively interpreting instrumentation of a high order. Upwards of sixty executants took part, the conductor being Mr. A. H. Peppin (music master of Clifton College). The principal compositions performed were Beethoven's C minor Symphony and the Preludes to Wagner's 'Meistersinger' and 'Tannhäuser' and the Prelude to Act 3 of 'Lohengrin,' with the 'Danse Macabre' of Saint-Saëns, all of which were admirably rendered and much applauded. Miss Edith Evans was the vocalist.

The first concert for the season of the Clifton Quintet was given at the Victoria Rooms on November 10, in the presence of a large audience. The players were Messrs. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Maurice Alexander and Hubert Hunt (violins), Ernest Lane (viola), and Percy Lewis (violoncello). The programme contained Brahms's String Quartet in B flat (Op. 67), Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in F sharp (Op. 78), Dvorák's Romantische Stücke (Op. 75) for violin (Mr. Alexander), and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat (Op. 44). These works received adequate interpretation. Mr. Arthur Walenn, the vocalist, gratified by his artistic rendering of the cycle 'Eliland, a song of Chiemsee,' by A. von Fielitz.

A fine performance of the 'Faust' of Hector Berlioz took place on November 19, when the Bristol Choral Society was heard in that work at Colston Hall. Choir and band numbered about 600, Mr. Riseley being the conductor. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Robert Cunningham, and Mr. Dan Price (in place of Mr. Andrew Black). There was an immense audience, and the work was received with enthusiasm.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Royal Dublin Society opened their winter series of Chamber Music and Organ Recitals on November 7. The performers were Mr. Sigmund Beel (first violin), Mr. P. Delany (second violin), M. Octave Grisard (viola), Herr Bast (violoncello), and Signor Esposito (pianoforte). The programme included Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A major.

Mr. Vincent O'Brien's choir gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' with orchestra, and a miscellaneous programme on November 16 in the Rotunda. The solos were sung by local artists, and Mr. Vincent O'Brien conducted. There was an overflowing audience.

The Dublin Orchestral Society have announced a series of five concerts under the conductorship of Signor Esposito, to be given during the season.

Visits have been paid to Dublin during the past month by Madame Albani, Florizel von Reuter, and Señor Sarasate.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Professor Niecks opened the new session at Edinburgh University on October 17 with a most interesting address upon 'The Predecessors of the Pianoforte.' The Professor characterized these instruments and explained their mechanism, illustrating their qualities by playing upon a clavichord, a spinet, and a harpsichord.

Few musical events create more interest among local musicians than the annual pianoforte recital of Mr. Paul Della Torre. The highest expectations are formed, both in respect of the quality of the programme and of its rendering, and these expectations are never disappointed. Novelty is a feature of all his programmes, of which the chief on November 14 was a Sonata by Glazounow, exquisitely played.

The Dedication Festival at St. Mary's Cathedral, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of its consecration, took place in the first week of November. The musical arrangements were on a most impressive scale, and reflected great credit and honour on Mr. T. H. Collinson, organist of the Cathedral, who conducted the Festival. The music sung included 'The Hymn of Praise' and Brahms's 'Requiem.' The choir, gathered from all parts of the diocese, was supported by a large and excellent orchestra, led by Mr. Dambmann.

A large number of recitals—vocal and instrumental—have recently been given by rising local artists, some conspicuously interesting, and all good. Notable among these concert-givers have been Miss Edith Walton, Miss Muriel Kerr-Brown, Miss Ethel Osmay, Miss Chrissie MacDiarmid, and Miss Jean Kirkcaldie.

Mr. Gustav Nielsen gave a most interesting chamber concert on November 3, in which he was assisted by Messrs. Winram, Hochstein, and De la Haye. The chief concerted numbers were Gade's Trio (Op. 42) and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Glasgow Select Choir celebrated their semi-jubilee at a concert on October 29. The idea of a 'select' choir originated with the late Mr. H. A. Lambeth, the city organist, and from Mr. Lambeth's choir sprang the present organization, which was first conducted by the late Mr. Frederick Archer, afterwards by the late Mr. James Allan, and is now under the experienced direction of Mr. J. Millar Craig. For twenty-five years the choir has maintained a well-deserved popularity, not only in Scotland but in many cities south of the Tweed. —The Glasgow Glee and Madrigal Society, numbering about fifty voices, gave a most meritorious performance on November 8, and if one may judge by the size and enthusiasm of the audience much interest is taken in the special class of composition which the Society seek to popularize. The singing was marked by much intelligence and great finish, and gave evidence of skilful training on the part of Mr. B. W. Hartley, the conductor. Vocal solos by Miss Jenny Taggart and Mr. Henry Brearley, and a pianoforte solo by Miss Helena Hartley, gave the necessary variety to the programme.

The first of this season's Choral and Orchestral Union concerts took place on November 15, when Dr. Cowen and the Scottish Orchestra were cordially received by a very large audience. A few changes have been made in the personnel of the Orchestra which, as in former years, numbers 80 performers, with Mr. Henri Verbruggen as principal first violin. The programme which, both with respect to selection and performance, was only moderately successful, included Schumann's Symphony in D minor, the Air and Variations from Tchaikovsky's 'Mozartiana' Suite, Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and a first performance here of Edward German's 'Rhapsody on March Themes.' Mrs. Henry J. Wood, the vocalist, brought to a first hearing in Glasgow two new songs by Eugen D'Albert, in addition to three songs by Richard Strauss and Mozart's Recitative and Rondo, 'Non temer,' the pianoforte obligato in the last-named being beautifully played by Mr. Henry J. Wood.

Perhaps the most notable event of the present season was the first performance in Scotland of Elgar's 'The Apostles' by the Choral Union and Scottish Orchestra on November 22. The new oratorio makes very considerable demands on both chorus and band, and it is eminently creditable to all concerned to record a performance which was excellent in almost every detail. From the beginning to the end of the concert there was not a single hitch, at least so far as the chorus were concerned, and Mr. Joseph Bradley must be heartily congratulated on presenting this difficult work so successfully. A better sextet of vocalists—Misses Muriel Foster and Gleeson-White, and Messrs. Henry Brearley, Robert Radford, Robert Burnett, and Andrew Black—could not have been selected for the solo music. The audience was one of the largest ever seen at a choral concert.

MUSIC IN GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In giving a forecast of what promises to be a very interesting season, mention must first be made of the Gloucester Choral Society, who will perform Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' 'The Walpurgis Night,' and Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George.'

Miss Ellicott and Miss Hirschfeld are continuing for another season the admirable series of chamber concerts for Gloucester and Cheltenham successfully inaugurated by them three years ago. The first concert was given on October 20 at Gloucester, when the programme included Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E minor and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A. In the hands of the Grimson Quartet and Miss Hirschfeld the works received efficient treatment. Miss Hirschfeld also played a pianoforte solo—Chopin's Ballade in F, No. 2. Miss Lenoir was the vocalist.

The first concert of the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society, under the able direction of Mr. C. J. Phillips, given in the Princess Hall of the Ladies' College on November 18, was in every way a distinct success. The programme was described as a popular miscellaneous one, and greatest attention was given to orchestral works. These, which were finely played by the band, included Cherubini's 'Lodoiska' Overture, Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, and Wagner's 'Siegfried' Idyll. The chorus and orchestra performed Nos. 2, 3, and 4 of Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' and the Polonaise from Glinka's 'Life for the Czar.' The vocalist was Miss Stella Robinson, who sang most acceptably.

The Hallé Band, with Dr. Richter as conductor, drew a tremendous audience to the Cheltenham Winter Gardens on October 30. Herr Fritz Kreisler played Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the first of two Philharmonic concerts (on October 25), Señor Sarasate again displayed his masterful technique in the solo part of Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto No. 3 in B minor, whilst the orchestra excellently rendered Schumann's D minor Symphony, under Dr. Cowen's direction, and Rameau's 'Les Indes Galantes' was also included in the programme. Berlioz's 'Faust' found the able choir of the Society at their best on November 11. Singing with plentiful vigour and intelligence, they gave unmistakably the best exhibition of their powers that has been heard for some years, and Mr. Branscombe, the chorusmaster, is to be congratulated on such good results. The soloists were Miss Helen Jaxon, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies.

Sir Edward Elgar honoured the Orchestral Society's first Ladies' concert in November by conducting the first half of the programme, which was largely made up of his works—the Overture to 'Froissart,' the 'Orchestral Variations,' and his 'In the South' Overture, the last-named being given for the first time in Liverpool. The composer was received in the heartiest manner, and the orchestra gave colourful interpretations of his various works. Miss Helen Jaxon was also the singer on this occasion. The first Gentlemen's concert took place on November 5, when Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Bach's quadruple Concerto in F (for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet), and Mozart's E flat Symphony were presented. Mr. G. F. Collinson gave a meritorious rendering of the solo part of Volkmann's Serenade for Violoncello and Orchestra, and Mr. Granville Bantock conducted with his customary skill.

Brahms was the chosen composer at the first Schiever concert, the two sextets (Op. 18 in B flat, and Op. 36 in G) being played by Messrs. Schiever, Alfred Ross, Carl Courvoisier, Weingartner, Walter Hatton, and Carl Fuchs.

Mr. Edward German came on November 12 to conduct a performance of his new 'Welsh Rhapsody' at a concert given by the Welsh Choral Union. This musically work, first performed at Cardiff recently, was well played by Mr. Harry Evans's forces. At the same concert the chorus took part in Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' with splendid animation. Mr. Ben Davies and Miss Agnes Nicholls were the soloists.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Admitting only such concerts as, in the whole or in some considerable part, showed definite artistic aim, the list of those held in Manchester since my last letter to THE MUSICAL TIMES is still a formidably long one. Of concerts that were orchestral, or choral and orchestral, I find six that call for notice, or at least mention. The performance of Beethoven's 'Fidelio,' on October 27, was remarkable for Miss Agnes Nicholls's magnificent rendering of the great Leonora air, and for a very creditable performance on the part of some, at any rate, of the less famous singers trained in this neighbourhood who sustained soli parts. At the same concert an ideal rendering was given of Gluck's 'Iphigenia' Overture with Wagner's ending, and Mr. Webster Millar sang artistically a tenor air from 'Der Freischütz' which is seldom heard. At the third concert of the series, on November 3, the orchestra again played with rare perfection in the 'Fingal's Cave' Overture, and gave a fine performance of Elgar's 'In the South,' which was heard here for the first time. Herr Fritz Kreisler was magnificent in the Beethoven Concerto, his second piece being Joachim's entertaining Variations for Violin and Orchestra. Glazounow's weak and unsymphonic Fifth Symphony concluded the concert. Elgar's 'Apostles' was given for the second time in Manchester at the fourth Hallé concert on November 10, when the largely rejuvenated choir were heard for the first time in their full force. The soloists were Misses Agnes Nicholls and Muriel Foster, Messrs. John Coates, Ffrangcon-Davies, and Andrew Black, and the performance was a thorough success. At the fifth Hallé concert on November 17, Miss Gleeson-White sang Weber's 'Softly sighs,' Schubert's 'Allmacht' (sung with Liszt's orchestral version of the accompaniment), and Tchaikovsky's 'Air des Adieux.' Volkmann's Overture to 'Richard III.' proved to be something of a curiosity, the very considerable beauties of the work being to a great extent discounted by the absurd use made in it of the bagpipe tune, 'The Campbells are comin', mistaken by the composer for an 'old English war-song.' At the same concert Brahms's 'St. Anthony' Variations were superbly played, and so was Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

At the first Gentleman's concert on October 24, the programme was orchestral, and as at the Hallé concerts Dr. Richter conducted. With a small orchestra he gave a charming interpretation of the Prelude to the third act of 'Meistersinger,' Beethoven's First Symphony, and minor pieces. Miss Crossley sang delightfully in the set of songs by Wagner including the famous 'Träume,' and she introduced a new cycle of songs by Clutsam, of which No. 2—'The star'—made a very favourable impression.

At Mr. Brand Lane's second concert on November 12 the capacity of the Manchester Philharmonic Choir (which he conducts) in massive choral singing was finely demonstrated. The work performed was Handel's 'Israel,' and the rendering was well worth hearing.

Of chamber-music concerts there have been six within the same period worthy of special mention. At the third Ladies' concert—the series managed by Messrs. Broadwood at the Midland Hall—on November 1, the principal performers were the Brodsky Quartet, and at the fourth, on November 15, the Bohemian Quartet, the playing being in each case perfectly artistic and the contrast of styles most interesting for those who attended both concerts. At the first of the Schiller Concerts, managed by Mr. Carl Fuchs, on November 9, an effective performance was given of César Franck's Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte by Messrs. Hegedüs and Edward Isaacs—the latter a young pianist born and educated in this neighbourhood. In association with Mr. Fuchs they gave a fine performance of Schubert's E flat Trio. Vocal music was given by Fräulein Meta Diestel, an interesting lyrical singer with a rich contralto voice, who did best in one of Wolff's Mörke Lieder—'Das verlass'ne Mägdelein.' Mr. Max Mayer gave his first chamber-music evening of the season on November 14, when, together with Mr. Kruse, he gave a scholarly rendering of sonatas by Beethoven and Saint-Saëns. Miss Henrica Jones, a young violinist trained in this neighbourhood, gave a concert on November 16, the principal work in the programme being Dvorák's B flat Trio, of which a good rendering was given by the concert-giver, associated with Messrs. Fuchs and Isaacs.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A vocal and pianoforte recital of high artistic worth was given by Fräulein Meta Diestel and Mr. D. F. Tovey on October 31. Fräulein Diestel's singing of songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms was full of character and showed real appreciation of inner meaning, and Mr. Tovey's renderings of Preludes and Fugues of Bach, Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 111), and Brahms's 'Paganini Variations' were highly intellectual and full of real strength and power.

The Newcastle Musical Society meet periodically to listen to chamber music discoursed by locally-resident artists, and during the evening the formality of a regular concert is dismissed by a few minutes of friendly intercourse between audience and performers over light refreshments. The chief item of their concert of November 8 was Sinding's fine Quintet for pianoforte and strings. Mr. A. Wall (the musical director of the Society), Miss F. Davis, Mr. J. Perry, and Miss H. Page were responsible for the string parts, and Herr S. Oppenheim was at the pianoforte. More attention to perfect balance of tone would improve the otherwise excellent quartet.

The late Dr. Rea, of Newcastle, produced in 1866 a sacred cantata of his own at one of his concerts. During the interim the copies have been scattered, but after much difficulty Mr. George Dodds has been able to gather together the greater portion of the missing numbers, and he arranged an interesting revival of it at Elswick Road Wesleyan Church on Sunday, November 13. On the following evening Stanford's Oratorio 'The Three Holy Children' was performed.

The choral concert season was inaugurated on November 16, on which date South Shields Choral Society gave Goring Thomas's 'The Swan and the Skylark' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' and Blyth Philharmonic Society, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding Feast.'

M. Zacharewitsch and M. Raoul Pugno have both paid recent visits to Newcastle.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The annual concert in connection with the Railway Guards' Friendly Society took place at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on October 20, when an interesting programme was presented, the artists engaged being Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Edna Thornton, Miss Marguerite Ames, Mr. Whitworth Mitton, and Mr. Andrew Black; Miss Elsie Southgate (solo violin), with Mr. Hamilton Harty and Mr. Sidney Hill, accompanists.

The weekly organ recitals and popular concerts given in St. Andrew's Hall during the winter season under the auspices of the Corporation and direction of Dr. Bunnett, City organist, have been well attended. A change has been made in giving greater variety to the programme by the inclusion of a larger number of vocal items. At the first concert of the season Miss Mildred F. Jones was the vocalist.

A most enjoyable concert was given on November 10 by Mr. Arthur Bent's orchestra. The works selected were entirely for the strings, and included Elgar's 'Serenade' (Op. 20), 'Liebesnovelle' (Arnold Krug), Bach's A minor Concerto for Violin and Orchestra (soloist Miss Mariette Carter), and the same composer's 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G for Strings. The orchestra played with taste and precision under the watchful care of their conductor, Mr. Arthur Bent. The vocalists were Miss Lefroy and Mons. Henri Zay, the latter contributing a song-cycle, 'Eliland,' by Alexander von Fielitz, and joining with Miss Lefroy in a duet from his own pen, 'Love's Question.'

A very attractive programme will be presented to the subscribers to the Norwich Philharmonic Society's concerts this season. At the first concert M. Jean Gerardy will be the principal attraction, and Miss Teresa del Riego the vocalist. At the second concert Mr. Julian Clifford will be the solo pianist and the Hon. Mrs. Clifford the vocalist; and at the third concert Herr Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance in Norwich, when an excellent programme will be presented. The Norwich Choral Society will join the Philharmonic Society in the first and third concerts, all of which will be, as usual, under the direction of Dr. Bates, the conductor of both Societies.

The arrangements for the Norfolk and Norwich Triennial Musical Festival, which has been finally fixed for October 25, 1905, and three following days, are in a forward state, most of the singers being already engaged and the principal works decided on, and the chorus, under the direction of Dr. A. H. Mann, are actively proceeding with the rehearsals of the works selected for performance.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The visit of Dr. Richter and his orchestra to Nottingham on November 11 calls for special mention from the fact that a local artist was engaged to take the solo in Tschaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 23). Miss Cantelo is too well known to need any critical support, but her most ardent admirers have rarely heard her to greater advantage than in this work, and her success was so marked that she had three times to acknowledge the applause bestowed upon her. The other works in the programme were the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Introduction to Act III., 'Meistersinger,' and Elgar's Variations.

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society opened their season on November 17 with a performance of 'Elijah,' in which they gave a good account of themselves. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Kate Holbrook, Mr. Anderson Nichol, and Mr. Frederic Austin. In the concerted solo music Miss Jennie Bentley and Mr. J. Gadd, members of the Society, rendered valuable aid. The concert was well supported by the public, and Mr. Allen Gill, the conductor, with the leader of the orchestra, Mr. H. Lyell Taylor, were accorded a hearty reception. Miss Thornton and Mr. Greatorex took part in the double quartet, and Mr. Wyatt ably presided at the organ. As a performance one cannot help making a comparison with previous efforts, with the result that this was not up to the Sacred Harmonic standard.

Mr. A. Richards gave his first orchestral concert on November 26. An orchestra of fifty rendered a good account of themselves in works by Nicolai, Elgar, and Mendelssohn. Miss Alice Hogg took the solo in Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and Mr. C. Keywood was the vocalist. Mr. Richards is to be congratulated on the result of his initial efforts.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

For the first concert of the Sheffield Musical Union—given in the Albert Hall on November 8—the committee elected to repeat Beethoven's Mass in D, thereby recalling their success in the same work at the Queen's Hall in April last. The Mass had never before been given in Sheffield. Dr. Coward directed a huge force of 450 performers, the odd fifty of whom were members of the Sheffield Orchestra, a local and very efficient body of instrumentalists. The soloists, Mrs. J. A. White, Miss E. Biggin, Mr. A. S. Burrows, and Mr. R. Charlesworth, were all members of the Society, so that the concert in every respect save one gave evidence of the rich musical material of the city—the solitary exception being Professor Johann Kruse, who played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and the solo in the Benedictus.

Dr. Coward's wonderful chorus won another triumph in the Mass. The sustained brilliance of the singing in the earlier portions, notably in the Gloria and the Credo, and the expression and refinement in the later sections, proved alike the endurance and the versatility of the choir. Earlier in the programme there had been an exquisite performance, unaccompanied, of the chorus 'Lord, Thou art good,' from the conductor's work 'The Story of Bethany.' The orchestra played the 'Zauberflöte' Overture. Mr. W. S. Jessop at the organ, and Mr. J. H. Parkes, as principal of the band, rendered valuable help.

The Penistone Choral Society—an organization under Mr. Joseph Cooper's direction who are doing excellent musical work in a bleak and scattered district—gave a capital performance of 'Acis and Galatea' on November 9. The singing of the chorus marked an advance on previous efforts, 'Wretched Lovers' being especially well sung. A performance of 'Elijah' at Pye Bank Chapel, Sheffield, under the direction of Mr. Charlesworth, and A. R. Gaul's 'The Ten Virgins,' at Cherrytree, conducted by Mr. Arnold Bagshaw, were among the notable and successful minor events of the month.

The Sheffield Choral Union gave a concert in the Albert Hall on November 22 when, under Mr. J. Duffell's direction, the 'Hymn of Praise' and Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens' were performed by a largely augmented chorus and orchestra. A new work, 'Hohenlinden,' from the pen of the Society's conductor was produced for the first time. Campbell's poem is set as a choral ballad, and the work contains some spirited music, suggestive and well contrasted. The orchestration shows skill and a feeling for colour, and the choral parts are well written and varied. The work was admirably performed and warmly received. Two days later the Male Glee and Madrigal Society gave a concert, also in the Albert Hall, under their new conductor Mr. A. S. Burrows. Mr. H. A. Fricker played organ solos, and Madame Dews was the vocalist.

LEEDS.

Though this is only the beginning of the season, and it is overshadowed by the Leeds Festival—which is rather apt to drain the resources, if not the enthusiasm, of local concert-goers—there have already been some interesting concerts at both Leeds and Bradford.

At Leeds Herr Fritz Kreisler appeared on October 25, at the first of Messrs. Haddock's musical evenings, and gave a most enjoyable violin recital. The following day was the date of the first subscription concert, at which the Hallé Orchestra, under Dr. Richter, gave a fine performance of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, introduced as a tribute to the deceased composer. Another feature of the concert was Mr. Willy Scott's brilliant and musicianly interpretation of Tschaiovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto. Two choral works were introduced into the programme and sung to perfection by the chorus of the Leeds Philharmonic Society: Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' the latter being conducted by the Society's choirmaster, Mr. Fricker. Mr. Fricker also appeared on October 29 in the rôle of conductor at the second of the concerts of the Municipal Orchestra, which he organized last season. In Mozart's G minor Symphony his band of fifty was heard to especial advantage, since, while it is excellent in quality, the strings are hardly numerous enough to be able to hold their own against the full force of brass and percussion. Mr. Fricker has, however, shown wisdom in depending upon the quality of his strings rather than on their quantity, and has not adopted the unsafe policy of increasing the latter by indifferent players who would add but little to the weight of tone, and would detract much from clearness and precision. The Variations from Tschaiovsky's Fourth Suite brought the full orchestra into play, and showed the excellence of its component parts, and left the impression that the band is still better than that of last season, and should, with further experience, be equal to all the work that is likely to be set for it to do. On November 12 the third of these concerts took place, and on this occasion the strings only were employed. The chief thing in the programme was Hamerik's 'Symphonie Spirituelle,' a work not only full of musical beauty, but technically admirable in the variety of effects the composer extracts from his limited orchestra. Handel's Organ Concerto in F (Set 1, No. 4), in which the soloist was Mr. A. Hague, was another feature in a programme which, though highly interesting, did not escape the monotony resulting from the constant employment of one tone-colour. The Broadwood Concerts have now been extended to Leeds, and began operations on November 16, when the Bohemian String Quartet, with Mr. Ernesto Consolo, took part in a concert of the greatest possible excellence.

BRADFORD.

At Bradford, on October 28, the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave their first concert under Dr. Cowen's conductorship. The programme consisted of Brahms's 'German Requiem' and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' the juxtaposition of which may be allowed to form the strangest and most striking contrast one can well imagine. The performance was bright and intelligent, though the chorus were hardly distinguished by the absolute beauty of tone that one looks for in the West Riding. The principals were Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Morfydd Williams, Mr. J. R. Sykes, and Mr. J. Browning. At the first subscription concert on November 4 the Hallé Orchestra, under Dr. Richter, played Glazounow's Sixth Symphony, which had only just before been heard at the Leeds Festival. Herr Kreisler's powerful playing of Tschaiovsky's Violin Concerto and his still finer interpretation of Joachim's Variations were prominent features of this important concert. On November 11 the Bradford Old Choral Society fell back for their opening concert on 'Judas Maccabæus,' a work which seems to have even more than its ordinary share of popularity at Bradford. Under Mr. J. W. Fitton's direction a generally adequate performance was given, the solos being taken by Madame Goodall, who sang the soprano solos most ably, Madame Wiseman, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. W. Thornton. On November 19 the Bradford Permanent Orchestra began a fresh season, under Mr. Allen Gill's able conductorship. Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, docked of its Scherzo, was the chief thing in the programme, and the performances of the Orchestra showed a distinct advance in point of precision and smartness.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Halifax Orchestral Society, though practically an amateur organization, are enterprising, and at their concert on November 3 essayed a difficult task in attempting the 'Faust' Symphony of the conductor, Mr. H. Van Dyk. This is an interesting work and, if hardly an adequate realization of its subject, contains some clever touches of characterization and skilful workmanship. It is perhaps too tentative in character to give the impression that the composer has in him that irresistible impulse that makes a great artist; there is too much of an air of consideration and but little indication of the power to adequately fill so large a canvas as the theme suggests. At the same time allowance must be made for the fact that the zealous amateurs in the band could not, even with the best will possible, do complete justice to the music, though they deserve credit for going farther than might have been expected. Interesting was Hans Sitt's Viola Concerto, and highly artistic its interpretation by Mr. Walter Haigh, a fine artist who is now entering the Scottish Orchestra, greatly to the loss of the West Riding. On November 17 the Halifax Choral Society, of whom Mr. F. de G. English is the conductor, gave hostages to Fortune—which has not been over kind to the Society of late—by choosing for their first concert 'Elijah.' A really admirable all-round performance was given, the principals being Miss Ethel Wood, Miss A. Lakin, Mr. Seth Hughes, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies.

Harrogate has enjoyed a miniature 'Festival,' this being the name given to a couple of concerts organized by Messrs. Haddock on October 31. In the afternoon the programme was orchestral, with Mr. Zacharewitsch as violinist in the Mendelssohn Concerto; in the evening the help of the Leeds Choral Union was obtained, and under Mr. Alfred Benton's conductorship a most forcible and effective choral performance of 'The Hymn of Praise' was given. The orchestral pieces were conducted by Mr. Edgar Haddock.

Hull has had two choral concerts of more than average interest. On November 11 the Hull Harmonic Society gave a highly interesting programme that included Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding Feast' and his 'Hiawatha' Overture. Miss Ethel Kaye and Mr. C. Saunders were the principals, and Mr. W. Porter conducted. On November 15 the Hull Vocal Society gave Parry's 'Song of Darkness and Light,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane,' together with 'The Hymn of Praise.' Both the less familiar works presented obvious difficulties, but the chorus, under Dr. G. H. Smith, sang most pluckily. The principals were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Kathleen Mayes, and Mr. Whitworth Mitton.

The York Symphony Orchestra, under their indefatigable conductor, Mr. T. T. Noble, gave on November 4 a concert that afforded very satisfactory evidence of the progress this zealous band of amateurs are making. The feature of the programme was Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo part being finely played by Miss Nora Clench, while the accompaniment of the orchestra deserved great praise.—On November 12 Mr. Padel and Mr. Noble began a new series of the resuscitated chamber concerts. Mr. Percy Sharman and Mr. Padel played César Franck's fine Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and an interesting, well-written Suite for the same instruments by Mr. Noble was another feature of the concert.

At Malton, on November 5, a series of subscription concerts, organized by Mrs. Burrell, was begun, Miss Nora Clench and Miss C. Bigge introducing Richard Strauss's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata, while the concert-giver and Dr. Aikin gave some well-chosen songs.—At Scarborough, on November 7, the second of Messrs. Cass and Owen Williams's Chamber concerts took place, Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet and Brahms's Violin Sonata in A (Op. 100) being the outstanding things in a good programme.

Foreign Notes.

CASSEL.

In 1804—just one hundred years ago—Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia heard Beethoven's then new 'Eroica' symphony, a masterpiece which was played privately at the house of Prince Lobkowitz. The Prussian Prince was so delighted with the work that it was repeated. Bilow when at Meiningen did a similar thing, on one or more occasions, with, if we mistake not, a Beethoven symphony. The latest instance of the kind occurred in the above city when Gustav Mahler's new symphony was played twice at the same concert.

LEIPZIG.

A festival was held from November 9 to 11 to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Schiller, when performances were given at the theatre of his 'Jungfrau von Orleans' and 'Don Carlos.' Schiller's poems set to music by Schubert, Brahms, Rubinstein, and Richard Strauss, were sung at one of the concerts in addition to choruses for female voices composed by H. Huber.

MUNICH.

The programmes of the Kaim concerts to be given during the winter, under the direction of Felix Weingartner, will include Bruckner's Symphony in E, Boëse's Symphonic Poem, 'Odysseus Ausfahrt,' d'Indy's Second Symphony, and a Violin Concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze. One concert will be devoted to Shakespearean music: Liszt's 'Hamlet,' Weingartner's 'King Lear,' Strauss's 'Macbeth,' and three excerpts from Berlioz's 'Roméo et Juliette.' Another will consist entirely of novelties, so far as Munich is concerned: Wolf's 'Penthesilea,' Elgar's 'Alassio,' Lieder for orchestra by Weingartner, and Taneiev's 'Orestes' Overture.

PARIS.

Many distinguished musicians were present at the inauguration of the César Franck monument at the Square de Sainte-Clotilde on October 22; and among them MM. Alfred Bruneau, Xavier Leroux, Wormser, Erlanger, Tiersot, Ch. Malherbe, Chevillard; and of ladies Mme. and Mlle. Bruneau, Madame Colonne, and the widow of the late composer Ernest Chausson. On such an occasion there were, as a matter of course, speeches. M. Marcel, director of Fine Arts, described Franck as 'the last of those grand capellmeisters whose earthly function seemed to have been to express, by the colossal voice of the organ, the regrets of fallen humanity, its aspirations towards redeeming purity, its contemplation and its expectation of the sublime destinies of the beyond.' The second speech was delivered by M. Vincent d'Indy, a pupil and ardent admirer of the French master.—The company which Signor Sonzogno will bring to the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre next year (May 1—June 15) will perform one classical opera and other works by composers of the young Italian School: Mascagni being represented by his 'L'Amico Fritz'; Leoncavallo by 'Zaza'; Giordano by 'Andrea Chenier,' 'Siberia,' and 'Fedora'; Cilèa by 'Adriana Lecouvreur'; Orfèce by his 'Chopin'; and Filiasi by 'Manuel Menendez.'

Mr. THOMAS HOPKINSON, 'Hull's oldest musician,' died at Hull on November 10. He was a native of York and was born on October 22, 1826. He became a choir boy at York Minster and later he was appointed organist of Pontefract Church, a post he retained for thirteen years. He came to Hull in the early sixties and was successively organist of St. John's Church, Albion Chapel, Christ Church, and St. Margaret's Church. He retired from the profession some years ago, but he continued to take a keen interest in musical education until the time of his decease.

Other recent deaths, which we regret to have to place on record, are the following: WILFORD MORGAN, formerly known as a tenor singer; GASTON SERPETTE, aged 58, composer of light operas; HERMANN LAROCHE, the well-known Russian writer and critic; DESIRÉ LALANDE, aged 37, the artist-oboist of the Queen's Hall Orchestra; GARNET WOLSELEY COX, of consumption, aged 32, an English composer of great promise; and TERESA MILANOLLO, aged 77, the elder of two sister violinists, both highly gifted, whose careers we hope to refer to in detail on some future occasion.

'H.' writes in reference to the biographical sketch of Eugen D'Albert in our last issue: 'D'Albert came to the National Training School holding the County of Northumberland Scholarship; it was not until November, 1876, that he gained the Queen Victoria Scholarship, competed for by the students of the school. In addition to those mentioned belonging to Sullivan's class, from the first, might be named Emma Mundella, Eva Pidcock, Hélène Heale, Bond Andrews, H. L. Balfour, William Hodge, and Charles Marshall.'

The Evening Schools held under the Education Committee of the London County Council are actively preparing programmes for united performance. These schools are not merely for young people but include a large proportion of adults. The programme of the East Lambeth Union includes choruses from 'St. Paul,' 'The Banner of St. George' (Elgar), 'The Challenge of Thor' (Elgar), and numbers of part-songs and choruses. Mr. Arthur G. Gibbs will conduct.

With reference to a statement in our November issue that the demise of the Ventnor Choral Society would leave that town 'without an important factor in musical life,' we are asked in justice to state that another Society has existed there since 1869 entitled the Ventnor Musical Society, which has performed a large number of choral works, the conductor being Mr. Evan Jones.

The Oriana Madrigal Society made a promising start on November 14, at Leighton House, with about forty-five excellent voices. Additional sopranos and tenors are however needed, and intending members should apply to the hon. sec., Mr. C. L. Stocks, 29, Upper Gloucester Place, Dorset Square.

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

BATH.—The Avon Vale Musical Society gave a concert at the Assembly Rooms on November 16, when the chief feature of the programme was Bennett's 'May Queen,' which was excellently performed by the choir and orchestra under the direction of Mr. J. S. Liddle. The choir were also heard to advantage in Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings.' The solo vocalists were Miss Viola Salvin, Mr. A. H. Forth, Mr. Owen Morgan, and Mr. Francis Harford. Mrs. Arthur Stothert contributed violin solos with much success.

BRIGHOUSE.—The Choral Society opened their thirty-fifth season at the Town Hall on October 25 with a performance of Cowen's 'Sleeping Beauty,' followed by a miscellaneous selection which included the part-songs 'Hail, golden morn' (Sydenham), 'The Violet' (Ainley), and 'Hail, memory' (Battye). The band and chorus numbered 120 performers, and the solo vocalists were Mr. Edwin Kellett, Mr. H. E. Cookson, and Miss Marguerite Gell, the last-named undertaking both the soprano and contralto parts, owing to the illness of Miss Eva Rich. Mr. J. H. Pearson conducted.

BEDFORD.—A highly successful performance of Mackenzie's 'Dream of Jubal' was given by the Musical Society on November 22. There was a complete orchestra, augmented by several well-known London players, and these with the choir numbered 250 performers. The choir displayed excellent tone and sang with much spirit and good attack under the watchful and energetic direction of Dr. H. A. Harding. The solo vocalists were Miss Beatrice Spencer and Mr. Joseph Reed, their singing in the Love Duet especially winning well-merited applause. The important part of the reciter was again filled by Mr. Charles Fry, who was very heartily applauded at more than one point during the performance. Mackenzie's 'Poem with Music' was preceded by the first of Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' Marches, conducted by Mr. P. H. Diemer.

CANTERBURY.—An orchestral concert was given in the Chapter House of the Cathedral by Dr. Perrin on November 18 in aid of the fund which is being raised to provide a memorial to the late Dr. Longhurst. The programme included Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture, Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), a Suite, 'Lake Scenery,' by Dr. Perrin, and the March from Dr. Longhurst's Oratorio 'David and Absalom.' Vocal solos were contributed by Miss M. A. Paske. Much credit is due to Dr. Perrin for his care in training the orchestra with so satisfactory a result, and for the good work he is doing here in furthering the performance of high-class music.

CHORLEY.—The Madrigal Society gave the first concert of their third season in the Town Hall on October 26, under the direction of Mr. H. C. Wilcocks. The chief features of the programme were Macfarren's 'May Day' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' in which the choir were heard to excellent effect. They also sang Elgar's 'Stars of the summer night' and the 'Soldiers' Chorus' from 'Faust' with admirable expression and vigour. They were well supported by the orchestra, in which a distinct improvement was noticeable. The principal vocalists were Miss Grace Shorrocks and Mr. Webster Millar.

Answers to Correspondents.

ON SLOW.—(1) The following organ pieces will be found suitable for Christmas: Postlude 'Good King Wenceslas' (Garrett); Voluntary for Christmastide (Ouseley); Six pieces for Christmas (W. T. Best); A Christmas Pastorale (Selby); Christmas Offertorium (Lemmens); Introduction, Variation, and Fugue on 'Adeste fideles' (Holloway); Offertoire upon two Christmas themes (Guilmant). (2) For organ arrangements of 'Messiah' choruses, try these, adapted by Sir George Martin: 'For unto us,' 'Behold the Lamb of God,' 'Worthy is the Lamb,' and 'Amen Chorus'; also the 'Hallelujah' arranged by Hopkins. (3) Books on organ construction are those by Hopkins and Rimbault; 'A Practical Treatise on Organ Building,' by F. E. Robertson (Sampson Low); 'Organ Building,' by W. E. Dickson (Crosby Lockwood and Co.); and 'Organs and Organ Building,' by T. Elliston (Weekes and Co.).

L.R.A.M.—(1) The point you raise concerning Bach's '48 Preludes and Fugues' is an interesting one, but the variants to which you refer are editorial—phrasing, expression, &c.—and not textual. The German Bach Society's edition is the most reliable for the text of these great classics, and this has been used by Ruthardt in his edition (Peters); (2) Yes, all the notes in your example must be played staccato; the fact that some of the stems are turned up and the others turned down makes no difference whatever, such typographical eccentricities are oftentimes misleading. You will find Klindworth's edition (of Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words') free from ambiguity in this respect.

ORCHESTRA.—The French horn is not an easy instrument to learn, and you should place yourself under a competent teacher. The lip must be adapted for the purpose, and in order to become a successful player a start should be made early. It is impossible to say 'how long it would take to be qualified to play in an orchestra': it would all depend upon the player and the orchestra. There is a tutor for the horn by H. Kling, published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel.

BRIDGE.—'Basso da Camera' is the Italian for a chamber-bass; that is, a small double-bass, such as is generally used by double-bass players for solo performances. The instrument is strung and tuned in the same way as an ordinary double-bass, except that the strings should be thinner to suit the smaller size of the instrument. The Basso da Camera was the idea of Mr. Hancock, a well-known violoncello player in his day, and it was first introduced at a meeting of the Queen's Square Select Society, November 6, 1846.

RUSTICUS.—(1) For books on the training of boys' voices consult 'The Art of Training Boys' Voices,' by Sir George Martin (Novello's Primer Series); 'The Boy's Voice,' by J. Spencer Curwen (J. Curwen and Sons); and 'A Treatise on the Practical Method of Training Chorists,' by J. Varley Roberts (Henry Frowde). (2) For a book 'about the divine art, artistically, historically, and æsthetically treated,' read Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Art of Music' (Kegan Paul and Co.).

R. B. N.—The Christian names of Arensky are Anton Stepanovitch, and that of Napravnik is Eduard. Arensky's 'Nal et Damajanti' was produced at Moscow in 1902; Napravnik's opera 'Dubrovsky,' at the Théâtre Impérial, St. Petersburg, in January, 1895; and Rubinstein's ballet 'Die Rebe' is dated 1882. The production dates of the other works you mention we regret to be unable to give.

CARLTON.—(1) Anyone is privileged to wear a hood, even a falsehood, without passing an examination; but as you are 'going in for organ playing,' why not 'go in' for an examination which, if successfully passed, would enable you to wear with a clear conscience the desired mark of distinction? (2) Consult an organ builder: instruments differ so much in construction.

A CONSTANT READER.—Look at the heading of Mendelssohn's Prelude in B minor (Op. 35, No. 3) and you will see that it is headed Prestissimo staccato: this settles the kind of touch required for the proper interpretation of the piece; may you obtain all the marks required for honours in your approaching examination.

A. F.—(1) The following composers, in addition to Thalberg, have written pianoforte pieces on the tune of 'Home, sweet home': Kuhe, Oesten, Spindler, Lange, Trehde. (2) We do not know a Christmas Waltz composed by Moszkowsky.

WORCESTER.—An illustrated article giving some information about Canterbury Cathedral appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of February, 1901. Worcester has not yet been done in the Cathedral series of these articles, but it, and others, are on our list.

MODERN MUSIC.—For 'Pianoforte Solos, quite up to date,' by the best of modern composers, suitable for a brilliant pianist, consult the works of Sinding, Liapounov, Schytte, Saint-Saëns, Rosenthal, Debussy, Moszkowsky, Balakirev, and Leschetizky.

S. W.—See Rockstro's 'A General History of Music' (Sampson Low). The critical writings of Berlioz would not gain in forcefulness by being translated into the English language.

F. R. M.—For studies in reading the Staff notation see Graded Exercises for Sight-singing (No. 91) and School Sight-singing Reader Book (No. 137) in Novello's School Songs; also Richard Mann's Manual of Sight-singing.

R. A. B.—Liszt has composed a Rhapsodie (No. 15) on the Rakoczy March and also arranged the same march; but the two pieces are quite different.

M. C. Y.—The term Agogics used in the book you mention may be roughly defined as referring to tempo rubato. The idea is discussed in Riemann's Dictionary under the heading 'Agogics.'

AMBITIOUS.—Try Franklin Taylor's 'Pianoforte Studies,' issued by Messrs. Novello in two series. The Selected studies, progressively arranged, will doubtless best answer your purpose.

A. B.—Apply to the Hon. Secretary of the Plain Song and Mediæval Music Society, Mr. P. E. Sankey, 44, Russell Square, W.C.

A. L.—The books you mention, except those that may be out of print, can be obtained through any bookseller.

SONATA IN D MINOR

FOR THE ORGAN

COMPOSED BY

ALFRED H. ALLEN.

Price Three Shillings.

"Organists may be recommended a Sonata in D minor by Alfred H. Allen. This is an extremely well-written work by one who evidently is an expert organist. In the Prelude the composer employs the rarely-used seven-four, alternating with three-four, tempo. His counterpoint flows naturally and without effort. There is an excellent fugal section in this movement. The Intermezzo is melodious and simple in construction, an Allegretto Scherzando in the middle affording effective contrast. The Finale worthily concludes the sonata."—Morning Post.

CHRISTMAS ANTHEMS

COMPOSED BY

EDWYN A. CLARE.

BLESSED BE THE KING. New. 5th 1000. Sol-fa, 2d.; O.N. 3d.

This Anthem will be a boon to many Choirs, the highest note being E flat. It is flowing, telling, vigorous, powerful, and exultant. Quite easy, yet full of musical beauty.

NEW. GOODWILL TO MEN. 7th 1000. Sol-fa, 2d.; O.N. 3d.

One of the most useful and available Anthems. Opens with a strong and lively Chorus, followed by a very expressive Solo with a beautiful change of key. The final Chorus is lofty and spirited, and contains passages for Men's voices, and Sopranos and Altos, which help to work up the chorus to a glorious finish. Choirs delight to sing music written in this style.

BEHOLD, I BRING. 14th 1000. Very popular ... 3d.

SING, O HEAVENS. 10th 1000. For Parish Choirs ... 3d.

WE HAVE SEEN HIS STAR. 11th 1000. An easy Anthem ... 3d.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE. 11th 1000. A very beautiful little Anthem, always greatly appreciated ... 3d.

A SAVIOUR, CHRIST THE LORD. An effective Anthem, with Bass or Baritone Solo. 5th 1000 ... 3d.

FAVOURITE MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS IN D. 16th 1000 4d.

AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS

(STABAT MATER)

FOR

SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

ANTON DVOŘÁK

(OP. 58)

THE ENGLISH ADAPTATION BY

FRED. J. W. CROWE

(Organist of Chichester Cathedral)

THE ACCOMPANIMENTS ARRANGED FOR THE ORGAN BY

H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

NOTE.

This English version of Dvořák's "Stabat Mater" brings the beauties of the work within the reach of those who, for various reasons, prefer not to use the original Latin. The adaptation avoids the use of any passages of a controversial nature, thus making it available for use in any English place of worship; and, whilst preserving as far as possible the original rhythm, no pains have been spared to make this English version both vocal and practical.
Chichester, 1904.

F. J. W. C.

The accompaniment, while not professing to be purely an organ arrangement (which would necessitate the use of three staves), will, it is hoped, be found useful at the organ and at the same time easily playable on the piano at rehearsals.

Very few suggestions as to stops have been made, but the plain indication of the pedal part throughout the work and of the instrumentation (marked in brackets) will be a useful guide to the organist in his interpretation of this complex score.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE
A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Is well ahead of all Mr. Gaul's previous efforts. . . . Special mention may be made of the treatment of the parable of the Prodigal Son, which occupies a conspicuous place."—Daily Star."The Victoria Hall, Hanley, was well filled by an audience who gave enthusiastic evidence of their approval of Mr. Gaul's music. The chorus and band numbered 350 performers. . . . A striking feature in the form of a delightfully instrumented Eastern dance in itself is sufficient to enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation."—STAFFORDSHIRE CORRESPONDENT, The Musical Times."Judged by the appreciative reception accorded it by the crowded audience at Griffithstown, it bids fair to eclipse the popularity of the same composer's 'Holy City.' . . . 'The Prince of Peace' is a work of an exceptionally high order. There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. The work is varied and interesting, and, like all of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, supplies a need which no other composer of music so satisfactorily meets, viz., a moderately difficult work written on classical lines. . . . The cantata occupied about ninety minutes, and from the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment. . . . Already we understand numerous requests have been made for an early repetition."—Pontypool Free Press."No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . 'Thou art the King of Glory,' a singularly fine chorus, worthy of any composer, living or dead. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneity, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm. This cantata, which completes the octave of Mr. Gaul's cantatas, we hold to be the best. If it prove less popular than the composer's 'The Holy City,' we shall be surprised."—Birmingham Daily Gazette."In every way worthy the great reputation and experience of its composer. . . . Is indeed a work of a very unusual character, and most probably destined to become more popular than any of his other compositions. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel."Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

PRESS NOTICE.

"Eugen d'Albert, whose performances of classical pianoforte music may be called typical, has prepared a critically revised and instructive edition of Ludwig van Beethoven's Sonatas for the Pianoforte. It is of the greatest interest to follow one of the most eminent artists of our time in his progress through Beethoven's compositions. In contrast with many others with the same aim—his precursors in this field of work—Eugen d'Albert has been on the whole sparing with his notes and explanations on purely practical as well as musical details. But the player in a state of development will find abundance of help provided; while the accomplished artist is unimpeded, freely to unfold his individuality. The editor's utterances—given as foot-notes—always hit the mark with reference to the performance, and are, with all their brevity, of admirable exactness and precision of expression. They are original, and reveal the mind of a real artist, d'Albert, apart from his keenly-thought-out fingering, having given many dynamic and agogic hints, this excellent edition is highly to be recommended for teaching purposes. The 'New Testament of Piano-forte Music,' as Beethoven's Sonatas are called, in contradistinction to Bach's '48 Preludes and Fugues,' has but rarely found an interpretation commanding approbation for every detail like the present one by Eugen d'Albert."—Musikalisches Wochenblatt.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

GROVE'S DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

EDITED BY

J. A. FULLER MAITLAND, M.A.

IN 5 VOLUMES, 8vo. VOLUME I., A—E, 21s. NET.

Twenty-five years having passed since the publication of the first volume of this standard Dictionary, the Publishers felt that the time had come for bringing it thoroughly up to date. New Composers, Artists, and Subjects had to be taken into account; omissions and errors to be made good; and the whole work to be reconsidered both as to plan and execution. The revision was entrusted to Mr. Fuller Maitland, who had already edited the Appendix to the original Dictionary under Sir George Grove's supervision. The New Edition will extend to five volumes, of which the first is now ready, while the remainder will be issued at intervals of a year, so that the publication will be complete by the end of 1908.

PREFACE.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason, the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern, so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

The lack of certain well-known hymns in that book and the need of extra hymns for certain occasions are often felt. This is clear from the fact that many supplemental appendices and leaflets are now used with it, particularly books for mission services, children's use, and other special occasions.

It may be said by many that we already have too many hymns, and that a large number are most unsuitable. There is no subject upon which persons differ more thoroughly than the suitability of different hymns. No two people will ever agree as to all the hymns in any collection. The only way of dealing satisfactorily with this problem seems to be to give a comprehensive compilation, together with guidance as to the character of each hymn. Hence, in the index of first lines a letter has been prefixed to each hymn giving an indication as to its characteristic—whether a hymn of direct praise, a prayer, or sentimental, historical, etc., etc. Those who object to hymns of any particular class can, therefore, easily avoid their use.

Guided by these two principles, hymns have been included for the following reasons:—

1. Hymns which, being in constant request, are inserted, not necessarily because of their merit, but rather because they have been found to be of real use in many cases.

2. Since the formation of other hymn books, much greater prominence has been given to music in connection with Choral Celebrations, and with this has grown a want of more hymns, especially short ones of one or two verses for different parts of the service.

3. So also has there grown a demand for further hymns on Almshousing, for Processionals of a greater length than usual, for Harvest, Flower, and Mission Services, besides other special occasions.

4. Finally, it is felt by very many to be a mistake to accustom children to the use of a Children's hymn book which will be discarded when they have grown older. Far better is it to accustom them at once, when young, to love the hymn book which they will use in after life. For this purpose a few more children's hymns than are supplied in other books seem to be wanted.

STOOD THE MOURNFUL MOTHER WEeping

(STABAT MATER DOLOROSA)

ENGLISH TRANSLATION BY REV. J. MONSELLMUSIC BY
F. ROLLASON.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

"A second performance of Rollason's beautiful setting of the 'Stabat Mater' was given in St. Michael's Church on Wednesday evening. . . . A second hearing confirms first impressions that it is a work of genius—as Canon Atkinson said at the close—a deeply reverent, sympathetic, and expressive setting of very beautiful words."—Coventry Herald.

"A feature of the service at St. Andrew's Church last evening, and which attracted a large congregation, was the rendering by the choir of F. Rollason's 'Stabat Mater Dolorosa.' In the solemnity of such surroundings and to an audience already impressed by the sacredness of the day, the beautiful music of this work, so touchingly descriptive of events connected with the Crucifixion, appealed with much force."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

THE MUSIC TO KING ARTHUR

WRITTEN BY
J. COMYNS CARRCOMPOSED BY ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

ARRANGED FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCE BY WILFRED BENDALL.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In 1894 the late Sir Arthur Sullivan accepted a commission from Sir Henry Irving to compose incidental music to Mr. Comyns Carr's drama of "King Arthur." The work was produced at the Lyceum Theatre, on January 12, 1895, and proved a great artistic success. After the withdrawal of the drama it was suggested to the composer that it would be a pity to allow such beautiful music to remain unpublished and become forgotten, and that a selection from it might be arranged in the form of a short concert-cantata. . . . After the composer's death it was decided to revert to the original proposition regarding the music, and the present concert-arrangement is the result.

2 Now once again Thou crownest

 Thou tendest Thy Creation
 And makest all things good.

mf 3 O let no base temptation,
 Lead us, Thy flock, astray,
 No strong delusion turn us
 From walking in Thy way,
 But may Thy gentle wisdom cres. Control and guide us still, f That we may use Thy bounty
 According to Thy will.

The musical score is written for piano, vocal soloists (Full Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass), and a choir. The piano part begins with a prelude in 6/4 time, marked 'Allegretto pastorale' with a tempo of 96 beats per minute. The prelude is in G major and features a 'p' (piano) dynamic. The vocal soloists enter with the word 'He' on a long note. The piano then plays a series of chords, marked 'senza Ped.' (without pedal). The choir enters with the lyrics 'sendeth the springs in - to the val-leys, which run a - mong the hills, . . . He'. The piano accompaniment for the choir is marked 'Ped.' (with pedal). The score concludes with a final piano chord marked 'Ch.' and 'p'.
